Congressional Record

SEVENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

SENATE

FRIDAY, JANUARY 3, 1936

The 3d of January being the day prescribed by the Constitution of the United States for the annual meeting of Congress, the second session of the Seventy-fourth Congress commenced this day.

The Senate assembled in its Chamber at the Capitol.

JOHN N. GARNER, of Texas, Vice President of the United States, called the Senate to order at 12 o'clock meridian.

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., of the city of Washington, offered the following

PRAYER

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, before whose gaze Earth in all her myriad forms aspires to Heaven and with innumerable voices sings the joy of her deliverance, draw us, Thy children, so near to Thee by our inward need that we may press our weakness close to Thy strength and win new power for the duties that await us in the days that lie ahead.

To Thy merciful care we commend our Nation that, being guided by Thy providence, we may dwell secure in Thy peace.

Be graciously pleased to bless our President, our Vice President, the Members of the Congress, the judiciary, and all others who bear rule in our beloved land. Help them to be masters of themselves, that they may be the servants of others; and make them ever mindful of their high calling to serve this people in Thy fear, lest the will to justice be overcome by the will to power.

Take away all hatred, pride, and prejudice, and whatever else may hinder peace and concord among the nations of the world, that we may see the dawning of a new day in which achievement shall overtake desire and aspiration, and the outbreak of the prophetic spirit shall be directed toward the transfiguration as well as the sanctification of life.

All of which we ask in the name and for the sake of Jesus Christ, Thy Son, our Lord. Amen.

CALL OF THE ROLL

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. GIBSON (when Mr. AUSTIN's name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] is necessarily detained from the Senate for the day.

Mr. MCNARY (when Mr. METCALF's name was called). The senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] is unavoidably absent. I should like to have this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. BARBOUR (when Mr. MOORE's name was called). I announce that my colleague the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MOORE] is necessarily absent. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. RADCLIFFE (when Mr. TYDINGS' name was called). My colleague the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] is unavoidably detained from the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] is absent in attendance upon the funeral of the wife of Representative STEWART, of Delaware.

Mr. LEWIS. I announce that the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE], the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BROWN], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are necessarily absent, not having, for sufficient reasons, been able to reach the Senate for its opening.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

DEATH OF SENATOR HUEY P. LONG

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, it is my sad duty to announce the death since the Congress last adjourned of my former colleague Hon. HUEY P. LONG, the senior Senator from Louisiana. At a later and more appropriate time I shall make some remarks in commemoration of the career and public services of my late distinguished colleague. I now offer the resolutions which I send to the desk and ask unanimous consent for their immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the resolutions.

The resolutions (S. Res. 205) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow and deep regret the announcement of the death of Hon. HUEY P. LONG, late a Senator from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

DEATH OF SENATOR THOMAS D. SCHALL

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, it is my duty to announce the death of my former colleague, Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL, of Minnesota. This being not the appropriate time to discuss his life and public record, that will be done at some future time, and I shall ask the Senate to do so. I present the resolutions which I send to the desk, and ask unanimous consent for their immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the resolutions.

The resolutions (S. Res. 206) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow and deep regret the announcement of the death of Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL, late a Senator from the State of Minnesota.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

SENATOR FROM MINNESOTA

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I send to the desk the certificate of appointment of Hon. ELMER A. BENSON to fill the vacancy now existing in the Senate of the United States from the State of Minnesota.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The credentials will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF MINNESOTA,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
St. Paul.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

This is to certify that pursuant to the power vested in me by the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the State of Minnesota, I, Floyd B. Olson, the Governor of said State, do hereby appoint ELMER A. BENSON a Senator from said State to represent said State in the Senate of the United States until the vacancy therein, caused by the death of Hon. Thomas D. Schall, is filled by election, as provided by law.

Witness His Excellency our Governor, Floyd B. Olson, and our seal hereto affixed at St. Paul, Minn., this 27th day of December, A. D. 1935.

FLOYD B. OLSON, Governor.

By the Governor:
[SEAL] MIKE HOLM, Secretary of State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The credentials will be placed on file.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, the Senator-designate is present in the Chamber and ready to take the oath of office.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator-designate will present himself at the Vice President's desk and the oath of office will be administered to him.

Mr. BENSON, escorted by Mr. SHIPSTEAD, advanced to the Vice President's desk, and, the oath of office having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. ROBINSON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 207), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two Senators be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House is assembled and that the Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. ROBINSON and Mr. MCNARY the committee on the part of the Senate.

NOTIFICATION TO THE HOUSE

Mr. MCNARY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 208), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

HOUR OF DAILY MEETING

Mr. ROBINSON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 209), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the hour of daily meeting of the Senate be 12 m., unless otherwise ordered.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES

Mr. ROBINSON submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 25), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Friday, the 3d day of January 1936, at 9 p. m., for the purpose of receiving such communications as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

BIRTHDAY OF SENATOR CARTER GLASS

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, before moving a recess I deem it appropriate to state that tomorrow friends of the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] will commemorate the anniversary of his birth. Some controversy has arisen as to the number of the anniversary. Some have insisted that it is the one hundred and seventy-eighth anniversary. [Laughter.] Others, including the Senator from Virginia, think that the correct record should be reflected by thirty-eight. [Laughter.] I have examined the authentic record and find that it will be the seventy-eighth anniversary.

We all rejoice in the vigor of mind and body which the senior Senator from Virginia demonstrates. He has had a long and honorable service in the Government of our country. As a Member of the House of Representatives he demonstrated brilliancy of intellect and thorough grasp of public issues. As Secretary of the Treasury he served efficiently during a period of great anxiety and responsibility. By his labors in this body he has earned the affection of all his associates.

I am happy to have the opportunity of taking note of and making remarks on these facts today since the Senate is not expected to be in session tomorrow.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the anniversary of the birth of the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] makes the day one of felicitation and pride to all his colleagues. I am unwilling to pass it by without an expression of congratulations and esteem.

Senator GLASS has had a long and notable public career. It is rich with words and deeds which will have a permanent and highly honorable place in the history of his State and of the Nation. Endowed with uncommon ability, gifted with a power of expression which belongs to few men, aggressive and courageous in any cause which engages his attention, he enjoys the confidence and the profound respect of his colleagues and of the people, not only of his own State and the Nation but of a vast number far beyond the borders of his own country.

We are all delighted that this anniversary finds him, as has been true for many years, engaged in constructive legislation, giving to the country the benefit of his trained mind, his firm grasp of public questions, his mature judgment, and his sound and exceptional understanding of the public good.

EXPORT OF WAR MATERIALS TO BELLIGERENTS—INTRODUCTION OF BILL

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, there is now on the statute books an important law which by its own terms will expire very shortly. It is known as the Neutrality or Embargo Act. As the administration desires to have a measure on the subject acted upon immediately, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill in order that it may be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the bill will be received and referred as requested by the Senator from Nevada.

The bill (S. 3474) providing for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries; restriction of other exports; the prohibition of the transportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war by vessels of the United States for the use of belligerent states; restriction of use of ports by belligerents; the registration and licensing of persons engaged in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing arms, ammunition, or implements of war; and restricting travel by American citizens on belligerent ships during war was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until 8:45 o'clock p. m. today.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until 8:45 o'clock p. m. today.

EVENING SESSION

The Senate reassembled at the expiration of the recess.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its reading clerks, informed the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives had assembled and that the House is ready to proceed with business.

The message also informed the Senate that a committee of three Members had been appointed by the Speaker on the part of the House of Representatives, to join with the committee on the part of the Senate, to notify the President of the United States that a quorum of each House had assembled and that Congress was ready to receive any communication that he might be pleased to make, and that the Speaker had appointed Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. DOUGHTON, and Mr. SNELL the members of the committee on the part of the House of Representatives.

The message announced that the House had concurred in the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 25) providing that the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Friday, the 3d day of January 1936, at 9 p. m., for the purpose of receiving such communications as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

The message communicated to the Senate the resolutions of the House adopted as a tribute to the memory of Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL, late a Senator from the State of Minnesota.

The message also communicated to the Senate the resolutions of the House adopted as a tribute to the memory of Hon. HUEY P. LONG, late a Senator from the State of Louisiana.

The message further communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. HENRY M. KIMBALL, late a Representative from the State of Michigan, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. ROBINSON and Mr. McNARY advanced in the center aisle, and

Mr. ROBINSON said: Mr. President, the joint committee appointed by the Senate and the House of Representatives to notify the President that the two Houses are in session and are ready to receive any communication he may desire to make have performed that duty and report that they have communicated with the President, and the President will deliver a message to a joint session of the Senate and the House in the Hall of the House of Representatives at 9 o'clock this evening.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, pursuant to the concurrent resolution agreed to earlier in the day, I move that the Senate proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, preceded by the Sergeant at Arms, the Vice President, and the Secretary, proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

ANNUAL MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The annual message of the President of the United States was this day delivered by him to the joint meeting of the two Houses of Congress.

(The full text of the message will be found in the proceedings of the House, p. 27.)

The Senate, having returned to its Chamber (at 9 o'clock and 59 minutes p. m.), reassembled, and the Vice President took the chair.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY OUT OF RESPECT TO MEMORY OF DECEASED SENATORS

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the late Senator Long, of Louisiana, and the memory of the late Senator Schall, of Minnesota, I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 10 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 6, 1936, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, JANUARY 3, 1936

This being the day fixed by the twentieth amendment of the Constitution for the annual meeting of the Congress of the United States, the Members-elect of the House of Representatives of the Seventy-fourth Congress met in their Hall, and at 12 o'clock noon were called to order by the Speaker, Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS, a Representative from the State of Tennessee.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following

PRAYER

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, Thou who hast set Thy glory above the heavens, as we wait in the afterglow of the new year, imbue our minds with knowledge and understanding that we may be worthy of the vocation whereunto we have been called. We would be still and know that Thou art God and receive the inspiration to consecrated labors and righteous achievements. Bow down, O Lord, that we may most urgently feel the responsibilities that are beating everywhere. Enable us to distinguish between liberty and justice, purity and impurity in the things that make for good citizenship. Graciously abide with our President, our Speaker, the Members, officers, and the employees of the Congress. Do Thou stimulate every impulse that makes for wise statesmanship and inspire us to toil with that faith which makes the heart strong and the step light. May there be built in our own civilization a kingdom of God full of blessedness, and purge the Babylons of hate and oppression in all this old earth. We praise Thee for our Republic, for its glorious company of apostles of truth, and for its noble army of martyrs for humanity. Heavenly Father, fill our homes with melody and peace and bring our whole land to the realization that life is more than livelihood; it is love, beauty, and sonship with God through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and sixty-seven Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Chair lays before the House a communication from the Clerk of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
CLERK'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 3, 1936.

The SPEAKER, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: Certificates of election in due form of law of the following Representatives-elect to the Seventy-fourth Congress to fill vacancies have been filed in this office, viz:

District	Representative-elect	Predecessor
Fourth Kentucky	Edward W. Creal	Cap R. Carden, deceased.
Second New York	William B. Barry	William F. Brunner, resigned.
Twenty-second New York	Edward W. Curley	Anthony J. Griffin, deceased.
Third Michigan	Verner W. Main	Henry M. Kimball, deceased.

Very respectfully,

SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Mr. CREAL, Mr. BARRY, Mr. CURLEY, and Mr. MAIN appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office prescribed by law.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a unanimous-consent request, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that notwithstanding the rules of the House it shall be in order at any time on Friday, January 3, 1936, for the majority leader to move that the House take a recess, and that such motion be made of the highest privilege.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. We find we are confronted with an unusual condition at this time, different from any that has been presented to us since I have been a Member of the House. I appreciate that it is provided in the Constitution of the United States that the President should address Congress from time to time on the state of the Union. This has usually been done at the beginning of each regular session, at which time the President presents his legislative recommendations to the House and the Senate. It has always been one of the most serious, businesslike, dignified sessions of the entire Congress. Whether that message has been delivered in writing or in person, it has always been delivered at the convenience of the Congress and during the regular session. I know of no exception during the entire annals of the American Congress.

The annual message has always been delivered at the convenience of the Congress in regular session, as I have said. Why this departure from the usual custom at this time? Does anyone maintain that there is any special emergency at the present time because of which we should change all the precedents and rules of the House that have been in existence ever since the Congress was established? Has anyone set forth any special reason why we should be called back into special session in the night to have the President address us? Is there going to be anything in that message which will not stand the usual light of the midday sun?

Mr. Speaker, I well appreciate my right to object to this unanimous-consent request. I also appreciate that the present majority will, as it has many times in the past, break all precedents in order to carry out the orders from the White House. If you gentlemen carry out this order, in my judgment, you will not be properly performing the duty that rests upon the majority in protecting the dignity and prerogatives of the House. That is no mere partisan statement on my part. The people of this country know what you are doing at this time and that the Congress has not been taken into consideration in making these arrangements. To substantiate my statement that what I say is not merely partisan, I refer to a statement by Mr. Arthur Krock, head of the Washington bureau of the New York Times, in the New York Times of yesterday, and the New York Times is the leading Democratic daily of the country.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. Is it understood that the Republicans should have their share of time for broadcasting in advance of the President's message?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a brief inquiry?

Mr. SNELL. If the gentleman will wait until I get through, I shall be glad to yield, or if the gentleman insists now, I shall yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Of course I do not insist.

Mr. SNELL. Very well. Go ahead.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it the purpose of the gentleman from New York to object to the unanimous-consent request?

Mr. SNELL. If the gentleman will await the conclusion of my statement, he will find out. If I am permitted to make a complete statement setting forth our position, I shall probably not object.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman knows we desire to extend every possible courtesy to him as minority leader.

Mr. SNELL. I trust the gentleman will do so.

The statement to which I referred, by Mr. Arthur Krock, reads as follows:

> How little Congress, and how much the radio audience, was in the President's mind as his plan matured can be gathered from the fact that his parliamentary leaders were the last of those concerned to be told. First, the radio time was reserved; then the newspapermen heard generally that the fireside talk was actually to be the annual message; finally, the information came to the House and Senate leaders through broadcasting-company representatives, who rushed to the Capitol to make the physical arrangements.
> Even after that shock the Democratic chieftains on the Hill had to wait a long time to get assurance from the White House secretariat that the broadcasters spoke by the card. It was then casually left to them to provide the congressional setting, on which score the President—anxious about radio time—showed no concern at all.

Mr. Speaker, that expresses in a clear and concise manner the situation that exists here, that representatives of the President's own party on Capitol Hill were not taken into consideration in making these arrangements.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to tell us from whom he was quoting?

Mr. SNELL. I was quoting a statement by Mr. Arthur Krock, the head of the New York Times Bureau in Washington. While you gentlemen over there may call yourselves leaders and pat yourselves on the back that you are great leaders, let me tell you this: You are not even consulted by your own administration in regard to the program in your own House for which, in the eyes of the American people, you are held responsible. You are not even fooling anyone anywhere at this time.

If it were not for the fact of your overwhelming, spineless majority, which will vote for every order that comes from the White House, you would not even attempt any such procedure. I also know that this is only a cheap attempt on the part of the administration, under the caption of an annual message to Congress, to use the opportunity to make a purely political speech defending the policies of the New Deal which are becoming so unpopular at the present time. Let me also say at this time that we have no objection to the President of the United States talking to the people as many times and as often as he desires.

I am beginning to think that it will take more than his winning smile and pleasant radio voice, even if it is on the air every hour in the day, to explain to the American people the fallacies of the New Deal legislation that he has proposed. [Applause.]

The only thing to which we do object is his using the Congress and this special occasion set apart by the Constitution as a sounding board for a political speech.

If my objection would stop such procedure, I would make it; but I realize, if I did, I could only delay for an hour or so this further humiliation of the legislative branch of the Government; therefore I shall not object, and you must take the responsibility of breaking an all-time precedent by turning a dignified function of receiving an annual message into a purely political speech, opening the President's campaign for reelection in November.

The whole question rests squarely on the majority, now let us see if you will use properly the power reposed in you to protect the rights, prerogatives, and dignity of the House of Representatives.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I thought that possibly the distinguished minority leader would say something that might really call for a reply from this side; but after listening to his partisan and political platitudes, which we expected, and finding nothing in his remarks that has not already been well expressed in the press of the country, I do not think it proper to take up further the time of the House in undertaking a reply to the somewhat feeble observations made by my distinguished and beloved friend [Mr. SNELL]. Therefore I ask that the matter be submitted.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. RICH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the majority leader what the program is for the balance of the day?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will state that later on.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the majority leader, with reference to a statement made by the minority leader, is this supposed to be a political address tonight?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what was the request?

The SPEAKER. The request is that the majority leader have the privilege of moving a recess at any time during the day.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I have a unanimous-consent request to introduce a letter that I sent to Dr. Townsend.

The SPEAKER. Not at this time. The Chair will recognize the gentleman after the request made by the gentleman from Alabama has been disposed of.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent at this time that I be allowed to say about two sentences and introduce a letter which I sent to Dr. Townsend and ask to have the Clerk read the letter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Washington withdraw that temporarily? He will have opportunity later on to offer that.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. There are some Members of Congress who will be defeated unless this goes in. [Applause.]

Mr. EDMISTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Washington to withhold his request until a little later.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution, which I send to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

House Resolution 375

Resolved, That a committee of three Members be appointed by the Speaker on the part of the House of Representatives to join with the committee on the part of the Senate to notify the President of the United States that a quorum of each House has been assembled and that Congress is ready to receive any communication that he may be pleased to make.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed the following committee to notify the President: Messrs. BANKHEAD, DOUGHTON, and SNELL.

NOTIFICATION TO THE SENATE

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 374

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House inform the Senate that a quorum of the House has appeared and that the House is ready to proceed with business.

The resolution was agreed to.

HOUR OF MEETING

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the hour of daily meeting be at 12 o'clock meridian.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

NORTHWEST TERRITORY CELEBRATION COMMISSION

The Chair announced the following appointments:

Pursuant to the provisions of Public Resolution 41, the Chair appoints as members of the Northwest Territory Celebration Commission the following Members of the House of Representatives: Mr. SECREST and Mr. JENKINS of Ohio.

MESSAGES FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Halsey, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had adopted the following resolutions:

Senate Resolution 207

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two Senators be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House is assembled and that the Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

Senate Resolution 208

Resolved, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following concurrent resolution, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 25

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Friday, the 3d day of January 1936 at 9 o'clock p. m., for the purpose of receiving such communications as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

THE BONUS BILL

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a statement of my own relative to the bill which I have just introduced providing for immediate cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates, refund of the interest to veterans, and cancelation of interest, which bill is sponsored by the three major veterans' organizations—the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, and the Disabled Veterans' Association.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman tell us what means he intends to employ to secure consideration of his bill?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. We are using every means at our command, and we hope to have it before the House at an early date.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Has the gentleman from Kentucky assurance that we shall be able to vote on his bill during the next 30 days?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I am not in position to make that statement at this time, but I am hopeful we shall be able to dispose of it sooner than that.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do so only for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Kentucky a question.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I shall be forced to demand the regular order. We have a program to follow and did not expect these unanimous-consent requests to be presented until later in the day.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, we did not demand the regular order when the minority leader was speaking. I want to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question.

Mr. Speaker, does the speech to which the gentleman from Kentucky referred relate to the bill which the newspapers report has been agreed upon by the leaders of the veterans?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes; it relates to the bill which has been agreed to by the major veterans' organizations.

Mr. O'MALLEY. When does the gentleman from Kentucky expect to be able to get consideration of the bill?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Right away.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Can the membership of this House look forward to having an equal opportunity to vote for any other bill when the gentleman's bill comes to a vote?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I think the gentleman should address his question to other authorities.

Mr. O'MALLEY. The gentleman thinks this question should be addressed to the Rules Committee?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me by the House, I include herewith statement which I made today concerning the bill just introduced by me, and agreed upon by the three major veterans' organizations of the United States, providing for the immediate cash payment in full of the adjusted-service certificates, refund of interest paid, and cancelation of interest accrued as follows:

The major veterans' organizations of the United States—the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, and the Disabled American Veterans—now present a united front in asking for the immediate cash payment in full of the adjusted-service certificates. At the request of these organizations, through their respective national commanders, I introduced the bill, upon which they are in complete accord, immediately after the opening of Congress today.

My friend and colleague, the Honorable JOHN W. MCCORMACK, of Massachusetts, a long-time leader in the fight for full cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates, joins me, through the request of these veteran organizations, in the sponsorship of this legislation. While introduced by me, the bill in question, because of its joint sponsorship, is to be known as the Vinson-McCormack bill.

The bill provides for the immediate payment in full of the World War adjusted-service certificates, for the refund of interest on loans paid by veterans, and cancelation of unpaid interest on veterans' loans. The bill reduces by one-half the present cash outlay heretofore believed to be required to pay in full the adjusted-service certificates, to refund interest paid, and to cancel the unpaid interest.

The matured value of all the certificates approximates $3,500,000,000. The adjusted-service-certificate fund created for the payment of these certificates totals about $1,500,000,000, which would indicate that there is approximately $2,000,000,000 additional required.

The United States Government life insurance fund has loaned money to veterans upon their certificates. The liens against these certificates, including interest, held as an asset of this fund approximate $500,000,000 as of January 1, 1936. In the event these liens were removed by the cash payment of the certificates, immediately it would become necessary for the purpose of this fund to make investment of this cash in Government securities. In the pending bill the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to make payment of the loans made by the United States Government life insurance fund upon the certificates by issuing to the insurance fund bonds of the United States bearing interest at the rate of 3½ percent per annum—the exact interest rate which the insurance fund is now earning on the veterans' loans. The bonds shall be at least 10-year bonds, which carries their maturity date beyond January 1, 1945. This certainly defers payment of $500,000,000 past January 1, 1945, the present due date of most of the certificates. By this method it will be unnecessary for any moneys to be obtained by the sale of securities to take care of approximately 25 percent of the entire expenditure.

The bill further provides that payment in full of the face value of the certificate shall be made upon approval of the application up to April 6, 1937—20 years from the day our Nation entered the World War. Those applying prior to April 6, 1937, are to receive the amount stated on their certificates, less the principal of the loans, if any. In other words, they would secure the full amount of their adjusted-service certificate, less the principal of the loans thereon, if any.

The veterans applying for cash payment after April 6, 1937, will secure face value of their certificates, less any loans thereon, plus interest at the rate of 3 percent per annum from the date of the enactment of this act until January 1, 1945, death of the veteran, or its cash payment under this act, whichever is the earliest date. This provision permits those veterans who do not desire to cash their certificates to hold them and receive 3-percent interest upon the amount due them until the happening of one of the aforesaid events. There are some 494,000 certificates upon which no loans have been made. The matured value of these certificates approximates $500,000,000. If the holders of these certificates have not exercised their right to receive 50 percent of the face value of their certificates, it would appear to us that with the interest item added there would be further incentive for them not to cash their certificates. This number of certificate holders who have not availed themselves of the loan privilege, whose certificates approximate, as we say, $500,000,000, does not include that other group of veterans who negotiated a loan on their certificates but who, with interest canceled on such loans, may now desire to receive interest from the Government upon the remainder of the amount due them on the certificates rather than cash them.

It should be pointed out that the rate of 3 percent per annum approximates the average cost to the Government for money loaned to it. The recent issue of long-term bonds, oversubscribed many times, calls for interest payment of 2⅞ percent per annum. In other words, payment of interest upon the face value of the certificates, less loans paid, can be made without the necessity of the sale of bonds to the public, the veteran receiving the interest payment himself and at approximately the same rate that bonds would yield to the purchasing public. In this manner, in our opinion, at least another $500,000,000 can be taken care of without new Treasury financing.

It is our thought that by the use of Government bonds to replace the lien obligation in the Government life-insurance fund and the interest treatment of the certificates that at least $1,000,000,000 can be taken care of, without present Treasury financing, on a sound fiscal basis, thereby relieving the immediate call for expenditure by the Government to that extent.

There have been many interesting facts developed since the bonus fight of a year ago. It is now admitted by the Veterans' Administration that as of January 1, 1936, there is a deficit in the adjusted-service-certificate fund of approximately $60,000,000; that even if the sinking-fund payments that have been agreed upon shall be made available, to wit, $112,000,000 per year for the next 9 years, there will still be a deficit on January 1, 1945, maturity date of most of the certificates under the 1924 act, of $371,000,000. This is based upon the assumption that such sinking-fund payments would yield 3 percent interest, compounded annually, and the $60,000,000 deficit would now be earning interest and grow, as it would, on January 1, 1945, to $78,000,000. Certainly nine annual payments of $112,000,000 total $1,080,000,000, which with $371,000,000 deficit means $1,451,000,000 necessary to raise in cash by January 1, 1945, even though cash payment should not be made now.

It is not the fault of the veteran that there is a deficit in the adjusted-service-compensation fund at this time or that under the present plan of payment into this sinking fund there will be a deficit of several hundred million dollars on January 1, 1945.

We are told by the responsible officials of the Veterans' Administration that in the early days following the passage of the Adjusted Service Certificate Act of 1924 they advised larger annual payments into the adjusted-service-certificate fund; and that if such payments had been made as their computations showed to be necessary, there would, on January 1, 1936, be in the adjusted-service-certificate fund $2,500,000,000 instead of $1,500,000,000. If such condition obtained today, with the special obligation and interest features contained in this measure, the cash would now be available for immediate payment of these certificates. We repeat that the World War veteran is in no wise responsible for the depleted condition of the sinking fund created for the payment of the certificates.

We hope and urge that all veterans and their friends will support the united efforts of their organizations and the bill which I have introduced.

NOTIFICATION OF PRESIDENT

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, your committee appointed on the part of the House to join with a committee on the part of the Senate to wait on the President of the United States and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication that he may be pleased to make, performed that duty. The President asked us to report that he will be pleased to deliver in person his message to the Congress tonight at 9 o'clock. [Applause.]

JOINT SESSION OF THE HOUSE AND SENATE

The Chair laid before the House the following Senate concurrent resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 25

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Friday, the 3d day of January 1936, at 9 o'clock p. m., for the purpose of receiving such communications as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Senate concurrent resolution.

The Senate concurrent resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, during my absence I lost track temporarily of the procedure before the House. Have all the preliminary steps of organization been taken?

The SPEAKER. All the organization resolutions have been adopted.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I understood some resolutions of sympathy were to be offered today. Are they to be submitted at this point?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands certain Members desire to submit unanimous-consent requests.

RURAL ELECTRIFICATION

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address I made over the radio.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me on Tuesday, December 17, 1935:

My friends, it is my privilege to speak to the farmers of America at this time on one of the most vital questions affecting their economic, social, and domestic welfare.

If an authentic announcement should be made tonight to the effect that a rich vein of gold had been struck, a rich oil field had been brought in, or a diamond mine had been discovered in any locality in the United States, and you were all assured that every individual had the right to stake a claim in that area, every railroad and every highway leading in that direction would be jammed, and crowded, and even the air would be swarming with people seeking their share of that wealth before sunrise tomorrow morning.

Yet we have in the Tennessee Valley, as well as in the Columbia and the Colorado River Basins, a wealth that is greater than any oil field, any gold mine, or any diamond mine that has been discovered since the world began. It is that great wealth of hydroelectric power now being generated and to be generated in the years to come.

This power belongs to you and your children. Your claim to a share of this great wealth has been established. The only question now is getting it to you.

It will enrich your home as nothing else has ever done—not only for the time being, but for all time to come.

This effort to electrify the farm homes of America is the greatest farm-relief movement, the greatest back-to-the-farm program ever instituted. It will give the farmer cheap electricity to light his home, pump his water, run his radio, electric iron, electric churn, feed grinder, refrigerator, and other electrical appliances necessary to make his home pleasant and attractive, lighten his own load and relieve the women of his family of the great burden of tiresome, monotonous, back-breaking, youth-destroying drudgery that now falls to the lot of the average woman in a country home.

So far as the farmer is concerned, it is the greatest movement of this age. It is the salvation of the farmers of America.

Every rural school, as well as every agricultural college in America today, is crowded with boys and girls, the future men and women of the country. What are they to do when they finish school? Where are they going? It used to be that farmers educated their children and sent them to the city to seek employment that would afford them better opportunities for success in life.

But that day has passed; our cities are full to overflowing, and practically all of them are literally teeming with educated men and women who are out of employment.

Therefore arrangements must be made to keep these children at home. They have nowhere else to go.

In the years gone by millions of farmers left the farm and moved to the towns and cities to secure for themselves and their families the conveniences which the country districts could not supply.

Through our program of rural electrification we are taking to the people in the rural districts every convenience to be had in the towns and cities without the noise and the extra taxes.

Cheap electricity is the greatest home builder ever known, and when it is supplied to the farmers of this country it will create the greatest back-to-the-farm movement of all time. It will not only light the farmer's home and make it more pleasant and attractive but it will stimulate his interest in that home and intensify the love which his wife and children have for it. It will, in fact, become a real home and not just another house on a farm.

I recently visited many of the electrified farm homes in my own district, where they are being served with T. V. A. power, and I have never known anything that afforded a farmer and his family so much satisfaction or which inspired them with such hope.

The rates those farmers are paying is 4 cents a kilowatt-hour for the first 50 kilowatt-hours a month, 3 cents a kilowatt-hour for the next 50, 2 cents for the next 100, 1 cent a kilowatt-hour for the next 200, and 4 mills a kilowatt-hour for the next 1,000.

This not only pays for their electricity but it also amortizes those rural lines and pays them out in not more than 20 years.

On every electrified farm I visited I found the farmer and his family overjoyed with this new addition to their home. Electricity had brought them new and untold blessings of which they had scarcely dreamed a year or two ago—lights for the home, barn, garage, and other outhouses, a radio to keep them informed as to what is going on in the world and to furnish them the finest and most wholesome entertainment, an electric pump to pump water for the family and the livestock, a refrigerator to supply the family with ice and to keep the milk, butter, meats, and vegetables cool and fresh, a washing machine to relieve his wife and daughters of the onerous burdens of washing and scrubbing the family clothes, and invariably an electric range to cook the family meals, together with feed grinders, milking machines, and other labor-saving appliances.

One farmer hailed me on the highway to show me his monthly electric bill. I have it before me now. He was using lights, a radio, an electric iron, and an electric range, and his bill for the month was $2.15. He said he was saving up money to get an electric pump and to buy his wife a washing machine.

One man told me that he used 120 kilowatt-hours one month, for which he paid $3.90, but he had no water pump. The next month he installed a water pump and waited with dread for his bill to come in. When it did, his consumption had gone from 120 to 124 kilowatt-hours for the month and had increased his bill the sum of 8 cents.

I have before me the bill of a man who used lights, fans, radio, iron, washing machine, refrigerator, range, and a water pump that supplied water for his family and a small herd of dairy cows, and also to irrigate his garden and truck patch during the dry season. His bill was $5.20. He said he had sold enough vegetables to pay his power bill for 6 months, while his neighbor's gardens and truck patches were burned up.

I found the women more enthusiastic than the men. It means more to them. It not only lights their homes and relieves their drudgery but it entertains their children, contributes to their education, and helps to keep them at home.

I stopped at one farm house 15 miles from the railroad. The man was getting along in years. His children were all grown and married. Three of them were living around him. He had electrified his own home and also theirs, and had wired every tenant house on the place. His wife told me that they had every necessary appliance in their home that could be operated by electricity from a fan to a radio, from the water pump to the electric range. They were simply delighted beyond expression. She said it was a new life for them.

I asked her which appliance she valued most. She unhesitatingly replied, "The washing machine."

I received that same answer from practically every woman questioned on the subject. I was not surprised. It usually takes 1 whole day out of every week for one woman in the average farm home to do the family washing—standing over a boiling washpot, or bending over a tub of hot water, scrubbing and wringing the family clothes—when she could put them in a modern washing machine, press a button, and in 2 hours have them hanging on the line.

And the same thing is true of the electric iron. No longer is it necessary to keep a fire in the stove or in the fireplace all day in the summer to heat the smoothing irons for the weekly ironing. That can be done with an electric iron in an hour or so without discomfort and at very little cost.

It takes so little electricity to run a washing machine, a radio, or a water pump that in the Province of Ontario, Canada, the Ontario Power Commission—which has one of the finest public power systems in the world, supplying cheap electricity to her people from the natural water-power resources of the Province—furnishes electricity to the farmers of Ontario, free of charge, to operate electric washing machines, radios, and water pumps to provide water under pressure for household sanitary systems.

Electricity to run a washing machine for a family of five people costs less than 90 cents a year under the T. V. A. rates. It not only saves time and money but it saves the nerves and strength of the housewife, and enables her to look and feel young at 60, instead of looking and feeling old at 35.

What does all this mean? It means a new day for the farm people of America, a new civilization, the dawning of the electric age.

"But," you will say, "this is confined to a small area."

It is now, but it won't be when the American people wake up and they and all their public officials join in this movement. If every public official will join us in this fight, we can electrify every farm home in this country at the T. V. A. rates.

We will soon be producing 1,400,000 horsepower of electricity in the Tennessee Valley and 1,800,000 at Boulder Dam, 2,000,000 at Grand Coulee, or 5,200,000 horsepower, which is more than the combined physical strength of the entire manhood of the United States—to say nothing of the enormous amounts to be produced at other contemplated projects from Maine to California.

Since the T. V. A. is a going concern, producing a large amount of electricity, with more to come, suppose we begin there and build transmission lines to reach every rural section within 350 miles of one of those dams. This will not go beyond the admitted distribution radius and will reach practically every farm in the States of Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Georgia, Arkansas, Louisiana, South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, West Virginia, Kentucky, Missouri, Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois.

The same policy applied in the West and in all other sections of the country where those great power projects are under construction or in contemplation will enable us to electrify every farm home in America.

This will not only benefit every farmer but it will add billions to our national wealth from resources now running waste and wanton to the sea, and will make America the richest, the most prosperous, the most contented, and most powerful nation the world has ever known.

THE NATION'S NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me on December 13, 1935:

The United States is a great nation. It contains within its borders practically all the raw materials and the agricultural and industrial resources to assure to all our people an abundant and contented life. Characteristically, the greatest desire of our people is to enjoy to the fullest these great advantages, unhampered by internal strife and devoid of conflict with other nations.

We have set up in our Government various agencies to deal peaceably with internal affairs and foreign relationships. In our form of government these agencies are normally predominant and rightfully so. But a number of times during our existence as a nation we have reached the stage where these agencies were no longer able to effectively safeguard our national interests. In such emergencies the only instrumentalities available for ultimate protection were those of our national defense. They have never failed us. In each instance the conflict has been settled favorably to us. We have recovered from the ravages of strife and have continued to develop into a greater and more prosperous nation. But if the decision in any instance had been adverse, our national loss might have been considerable, and we would not now be the happy peace-loving nation which we are.

More and more we find the nations of the world realizing the importance of ample national resources. Many nations, some of them relatively powerful, are decidedly lacking therein. Today the world is torn with clashes of national policy, and the time may again come when the agencies of our Government, which normally deal with internal affairs and foreign relationships, will no longer be able to adequately protect our national interests. Ready for such an emergency we must again have a national defense which cannot fail.

The Army and the Navy, with their respective air components, are the agencies which directly combat the aggressive measures taken by those who by armed conflict seek to subordinate our will to theirs. I believe in a Navy second to none, with modern vessels adequately manned, and supported by sufficient ship-based aircraft to perform observation missions and to provide an invincible fleet air striking force. However armed conflict may begin, it is generally settled on the land. So we must prepare for the time when our Army, supported by a land-based general-headquarters air force, may have to put forth its supreme effort in order to maintain this Nation intact from despoliation.

Being a member of the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives, and assigned to the subcommittee acting on War Department appropriations, I have endeavored by research, study, and personal contact to become intimately familiar with the War Department's participation in national defense. It is this phase of our national defense about which I propose to speak in some detail.

Our peace-time Military Establishment consists of the Regular Army, the National Guard, and the Organized Reserve. Closely related to them but not forming an integral part thereof are the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, the citizens' military training camps, and the National Rifle Association.

The mission of the Regular Army is to garrison our overseas possessions and the more important seacoast defenses in the continental United States; to form the initial covering force behind which our Nation mobilizes for war; and to furnish the personnel to train, equip, and direct our great citizen army raised at the outbreak of the emergency. In addition it has the responsibility of providing essential peace-time preparation in organization, training, development of weapons, and matériel procurement. Studies made over the past 5 years have indicated that an officer personnel of 14,000 and an enlisted strength of 165,000 is the minimum peace-time strength necessary for the Regular Army to successfully meet its responsibilities. Realizing this necessity, and after careful consideration, Congress at its last session directed the increase and appropriated the funds required to reach the goal of 165,000 enlisted men by June 30, 1936.

The National Guard, a force pertaining to the various States and under the direct control of their Governors, is maintained primarily to insure domestic tranquillity. However, realizing the potential national value of such a force, Congress directed a general reorganization of the Guard so as to secure a force which, when combined, would form complete tactical units. Federal recognition and help were provided, and upon the declaration of an emergency by Congress the President was authorized to call into active Federal service any or all of the federally recognized units and members of the guard. As a result of this action by Congress the efficiency of the National Guard has been greatly increased, and after a short period of preparation many of its units will be ready to effectively reinforce the Regular Army and to engage efficiently in battle. Its present strength is approximately 190,000, organized into 18 Infantry and 4 Cavalry divisions with certain corps, army and auxiliary troops. To round out the combat units a minimum strength of 210,000 seems desirable. At the last session of Congress 5,000 additional men were authorized as the first step toward reaching this desired minimum.

A most important and essential element of our national defense is the Officers' Reserve Corps. It is a splendid group of men, largely college graduates, who by correspondence courses and by actual training have fitted themselves to take their places in both the Regular Army and the great citizen army which will be mobilized for an emergency. Initial requirements total 120,000, with a present strength of 92,000. For a number of years approximately 20,000 have received 2 weeks' training annually. However, considerable advantage would result from having a schedule which, while giving the average Reserve officer active-duty training at least 1 year in 4, would insure the younger officers of the combat branches being called to active duty somewhat more frequently.

Although not a part of the Army of the United States, the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, the citizens' military training camps, and the National Rifle Association have a definite place in our scheme of national defense. They give a large amount of fundamental training to many young men who are the potential officers and noncommissioned officers of our future armies. Qualifying graduates of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps and citizens' military camps are commissioned in the Officers' Reserve Corps. Some, as vacancies occur, are commissioned in the Regular Army. These organizations are essential elements in our national defense; their work is most commendable, and they deserve the whole-hearted support of every patriotic citizen.

To engage in battle with some assurance of success an army must have not only modern weapons but an organization adapted to the effective use of these weapons. Until a very short time ago our armed forces were almost entirely equipped with armament and munitions left over from the World War, and our tactical formations were adapted to their best use. Although continuous experimentation and development by our technicians had produced pilot models at least equal to those of any other army, lack of funds has prohibited procurement in quantities sufficient to permit the development of appropriate organization and tactical doctrines and to supply the covering force in the early stages of an emergency. These serious defects were recognized and remedial action undertaken about 2 years ago.

Early in 1934 funds became available to begin the complete modernization of our Army. Over a relatively short period the latest in equipment, weapons, airplanes, and mechanical transport are to be secured in quantities sufficient to permit definite determination of organization and tactical doctrines, and to provide for the effective arming of the covering force required in the early stages of an emergency. Thereafter reserves will be established sufficient to carry us over the period between the outbreak of hostilities and the time when industry swings into war production.

In my recent travels throughout the country in studying our national defense and in my contacts with various elements of our national defense, I have noticed their enthusiasm, high morale, and devotion to our country. I was particularly impressed with the uniform excellence of the organized units and their high standard of efficiency. But they must have modern equipment. The Springfield rifle must be replaced with the semiautomatic shoulder rifle. Our field artillery carriages must be modernized to permit greater flexibility of fire, longer range, and high speed motor traction. We must have motor-propelled, mechanically operated weapons, such as tanks, combat cars, and other types of armored vehicles capable of operating on the battlefield. Our seacoast defenses need more long-range guns, and everywhere there is a grave necessity for antiaircraft artillery.

The airplane has become an indispensable member of the military team. In the general headquarters air force the Army has a powerful weapon with tremendous capabilities. But it must have enough modern planes to make it effective. The approximate airplane strength of our Army is 1,358, which is far below the 2,320 which both Army and civilian experts on national defense believe to be the absolute minimum. I hope that in the next 3 years sufficient funds will be available to bring the strength up to 3,000 serviceable airplanes.

Continuous contact with the air arm has emphasized to the ground troops the important advantage gained by speed. Greater and greater mobility must be secured and our leaders are alert to achieve this. The load of the soldier is being decreased, suitable motor transport is planned for procurement, mechanical equipment has been designed, and a separate mechanized force is being developed to operate independently and with speed.

Our defense forces are progressive. They are anxious to adopt innovations of practical value and may be relied on to perform their duties in peace or war in keeping with the finest traditions of our glorious past.

RETURN TO OUR FARMERS THEIR HOMES FREE OF DEBT AND AGAIN WE SHALL BECOME A HEALTHY AND PROSPEROUS NATION

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include therein a speech which I delivered before a meeting of the Young Democratic Club of the First Congressional District of Georgia in Sylvania, Ga., on Saturday, September 28, 1935.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following speech which I delivered at a meeting held by the Young Democratic Club of the First Congressional District of Georgia in Sylvania, Ga., on Saturday, September 28, 1935:

Mr. Chairman, members of the Young Democratic Club of the First Congressional District of Georgia, ladies, and gentlemen, I deeply appreciate this opportunity to meet with your splendid group and take part in your program here in this beautiful and progressive city of Sylvania, Ga.

The congenial hospitality displayed by our hosts here today typifies the spirit of the good people of Screven County, and you will find that the welcome which has been accorded you is as genuine as it is hearty.

I congratulate you, the young Democrats of the First District of Georgia, for the great interest which you are taking in the affairs of our country and for the serious and sincere manner in which you approach the vital problems now confronting our people.

That there has been an unhealthy condition existing within the physical structure of our civilization has been evident for a long period of years. However, the rapidity with which the disease grew and the suddenness with which the crisis arrived have created confusion among our leaders and necessitated emergency treatments.

AMERICAN PEOPLE SEEK REFUGE IN DEMOCRATIC PARTY

The people of this great Nation have turned in haste to the Democratic Party for help in this national crisis.

The response has been equally as spontaneous.

Those placed in positions of leadership have commanded the national resources in meeting the emergency. Over $10,000,000,000 of the accumulated wealth of the country has been made available to combat the disease and to provide life's necessities for the people.

This transfusion of new economic blood into the life veins of our economic structure has revived the patient and brought hope again to a despairing civilization.

However, more than emergency treatments are necessary.

It is essential to treat the disease and remove its cause in order to save the life of the patient and restore him to normal health again.

Great strides have been made in this direction.

LAWS ENACTED RESTORING INDUSTRIAL PROSPERITY

Permanent remedies have been worked out by skilled physicians.

Legislative bodies have readily cooperated and have enacted the remedies into law.

New experiments in legislation dealing with the industrial and financial affairs of the country have been undertaken in an effort to replace emergency treatment with permanent recovery.

Great financial institutions have been saved through Government aid.

Industry has been rehabilitated.

Bank depositors have been given protection.

Social legislation guaranteeing living wages, economic security, and social benefits for the industrial workers of the land have been adopted.

Other similar measures of equal importance have been passed.

NO PERMANENT RELIEF FOR AGRICULTURE

In one great field, however, only temporary treatment has been given.

In the field of agriculture the crisis which confronts the farmer is equally as acute as that which has confronted industry and finance.

Those in authority have readily extended a sympathetic hand to the destitute farmers of the Nation.

Millions of dollars have been added to their income and untold benefits have been granted.

The farm remedies so far, however, have been for the most part temporary, with no program of permanent rehabilitation yet considered. And before there can be a permanent recovery from our economic crisis the farmers of the Nation must be restored to a healthy condition of normal prosperity.

Our civilization is based upon agriculture.

The life of our Nation is dependent upon the soil.

There is no new wealth except that produced through the application of human energies to the natural resources.

Unless the disease which has brought agriculture down prostrate, "sick unto death", is cured, all other remedies applied in other fields will prove futile.

FARM HOMES FREE OF DEBT ESSENTIAL TO LIFE OF OUR GOVERNMENT

In order to revive agriculture, our Government must first restore to the farmers their homes free of debt and protect them in the enjoyment of the fruits of their labor.

At the time our Government was established, other than Negro slavery, there was no tenant system or farm mortgages in this country.

This condition wherein the producers of the raw products had free access to the soil and unrestricted use of their new wealth was an essential factor in the building of our Government.

It is a fundamental and essential factor of Jeffersonian Democracy.

Today such economic independence does not prevail. Over two-thirds of the farmers are either tenants or have heavy mortgages over their farms which can never be repaid. And this percentage grows daily.

FARM TENANTRY THREATENS DESTRUCTION OF FREE INSTITUTIONS

An unfair and unjust economic system has produced this condition. It has forced the farmers from their homes, deprived them of the fruits of their labor, and robbed them of their freedom and happiness.

It now challenges the principles of Jeffersonian Democracy and threatens our Christian civilization.

Under such conditions it is impossible to long maintain free government.

It is foolish to talk of freedom and liberty when over two-thirds of those who really support the Government are denied their freedom and liberty. Yet that is the condition existing in this Nation today.

Within the last few days three different farmers have come to my office begging for help in an honest effort to save their farm homes, which are their only means of a living for themselves and their families, from foreclosure.

One of these farmers owned 300 acres. Twelve years ago he borrowed $4,500. Since that time he has paid out over $3,000 charges on the loan, yet he still owes $4,400.

The three farmers borrowed a total sum of $8,600 on their farms and the loans have run for an average period of 12 years.

They have paid out over $7,000 charges and still owe $8,000 of the original loans.

During these 12 years these three good men, together with their wives and children, have given the best part of their lives toward creating new wealth with which to pay interest.

The major portion of the purchasing power of their raw products has been paid out in charges on the farm mortgage.

They have produced plenty, but the purchasing power of their new wealth has been loss to them, thus driving them deeper and deeper into want and destitution.

Today these three good American families are in far worse condition than they were 12 years ago.

Multiply these three farm families by 1,000,000 and you have a true picture of the condition existing in American agriculture.

Their problem is the same as that confronting 3,000,000 farm families in America today.

INTEREST CHARGES CONSUME AMOUNT EQUAL TO COTTON CROP

Did you ever stop to consider that the interest charges alone on all farm mortgages of the Nation total approximately $600,000,000 annually?

It will take the entire cotton crop of the Nation, which amounts to approximately $600,000,000 this year, to pay the annual interest alone on farm mortgages without reducing the principal of the debts one penny.

The average assessment for interest against the average farm over which there is a mortgage equals to over 16 percent of the gross value of the products of that farm, or over $200 per farm.

This tribute of 16 percent, which is demanded by the money changers of our Nation of the farmers for the privilege of living on this earth, is almost double the Biblical tithe which is assessed as a fair tribute for the benefits so graciously bestowed by our Divine Creator.

The total rents, royalties, and interest charges against the farm products raised by two-third of the farm families of the Nation are approximately $1,000,000,000 annually, or over 10 percent of the total gross value of the farm products raised by all the farmers of the Nation.

Certainly such tremendous assessments are not justified by the Christian principles which underlie our civilization.

FARM CHARGES GIVEN AS BASIC CAUSE OF ECONOMIC DEPRESSION

Herein, my fellow Democrats, lies the basic reason for the present economic crisis. It is the simple fact that the purchasing power of the raw products is lost to the farmers who produce them. These farmers, under present economic conditions, are unable to exchange the full value of their new wealth for the finished products.

The vast amount of raw products which has been forced into the markets of the Nation annually in order to pay this stupendous sum of $1,000,000,000 without the producers receiving any benefits in exchange, has resulted in the accumulation of tremendous surpluses of both raw and finished products.

At the same time it has created a condition of starvation in the midst of plenty, such as we have witnessed during the last few years.

This unfair economic condition has driven the farmers to despair, and they can never possibly recover their rightful position without the aid of the Government.

Unless they are restored to their proper place in the economic structure of our Nation there can be no hope for the continuation of our free institutions.

And our Government, as based upon the ideals of Jeffersonian Democracy, shall perish from the earth.

FARM HOMESTEAD BILL PRESENTED AS REMEDY

Recognizing these facts, and in a sincere effort as your Congressman to eliminate this unwholesome condition, I have introduced in Congress a measure which embodies the principle upon which this problem can and shall be solved.

This bill, H. R. 8286, is known as "An act to provide homesteads free of debt for actual farm families."

In this measure I have presented to the American people the framework around which can be built the only permanent solution for our farm problem that is in complete harmony with the ideals of Jeffersonian Democracy.

I propose that the Federal Government shall liquidate the farm debts of the Nation and give back to deserving farm families adequate homesteads free of debt, protecting them from again being mortgaged or encumbered.

I propose that this Government, which so liberally gave $20,000,000,000 toward protecting and rehabilitating the people of Europe, and which so readily gave $10,000,000,000 to meet the crisis through which we now pass, now proceed to invest sufficient sums to permanently restore the mudsills of free government by lifting the farm mortgages of the Nation and making the farmers again a group of free and independent people earning their honest living by the sweat of their brow.

Let us return to the sound principles of the old Mosaic laws, which point to a program of land redemption as a true solution of this national economic problem.

Return to our farmers their homes free of debt and again we shall become a healthy and prosperous Nation.

PROVISIONS OF BILL EMBODY PRINCIPLE OF JEFFERSONIAN DEMOCRACY

There is nothing new in this proposal.

It is the simple application of pure Jeffersonian Democracy to a vital public problem which threatens the life of the Nation.

I do not ask special privileges for the farm families, but only an opportunity to earn an honest living. Not special favors, but the God-given right to live in equality with all men.

All the other members of the American economic family, save agriculture, the most important of them all, have received permanent treatments at the hands of the Democratic Party and are now well on the road to recovery.

It is our task, young Democrats of Georgia, to now apply the principles of true Jeffersonian Democracy as a sure and permanent cure for the present diseased condition of agriculture.

APPEALS TO YOUNG DEMOCRATS TO RALLY TO CAUSE OF ECONOMIC FREEDOM FOR FARMER

I am proud of an opportunity to fight with you in this just cause.

Here on the sacred soils of a great State founded upon the proposition that the shackles of debt shall never stifle the freedom nor destroy the liberty of humans born equal in the sight of God we have the opportunity to rededicate ourselves to this principle of human justice.

The opportunity to serve humanity which confronts us today is equal to that which faced the master minds who framed the Government which has made our liberties secure for over a century and a half.

The true pathway of the future lies not in the ways of communism, socialism, or despotism.

The true course lies in the ways of true Americanism, the intelligent application of the principles of true Jeffersonian Democracy to the problems before us.

Our task, young Democrats, is not destruction but perfection.

FARMERS TO NOT ENVY OTHER GROUPS

We do not envy these groups which have possibly made greater strides than the farmers in solving their problems and securing for themselves a greater degree of economic justice.

We rejoice in their progress and have always been loyal in support of their just demands.

However, the American people must recognize that the industrial forces of the Nation cannot continue to grow and expand at the expense of agriculture.

All groups must move along on an equal plane in a condition of normal prosperity if we would see our institutions grow stronger and our people maintain their freedom.

The problem of the farmer is the Nation's problem. And it is the sacred duty of our great Democratic Party to devote its energies toward a solution of this problem.

FREE INSTITUTIONS BUILT ABOUND HOMES FREE OF DEBT

The home is the unit of our Christian civilization.

Our free institutions are of necessity built around free homes occupied by free citizens.

The way which I am pointing out to you today, my fellow Jeffersonian Democrats, is right. It is just. It is the American way. And it is in harmony with the eternal laws of nature and the divine laws of God.

The young Democrats of the great First Congressional District of Georgia are capable of leading to victory in this fight for the freedom of 6,000,000 farm families and the safety of our free institutions.

It is our privilege here today to lead in the fight to restore to free American citizens their homes free of debt, and to join hands with our forefathers who have bequeathed to us our Christian institutions in striving toward the fulfillment of the day prophesied by the saints of old "when then shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig tree; and none shall make them afraid."

NATURE AND EXTENT OF LEGISLATION THAT WILL PROBABLY BE CONSIDERED BY THE SEVENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio address delivered by the Speaker the other day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of the Honorable JOSEPH W. BYRNS, Speaker of the House of Representatives, speaking in the National Radio Forum and broadcast on a coast-to-coast network of the National Broadcasting Co. on December 30, 1935.

The Speaker outlined his ideas concerning the nature and extent of the legislation that will probably be considered during this second session of the Seventy-fourth Congress. He made a conservative and statesmanlike address that I am sure the country will appreciate and will deem worthy of preservation in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The text of the Speaker's address is as follows:

The second session of the Seventy-fourth Congress will convene January 3. A number of important measures are now awaiting consideration, and future development may make it essential to consider others before the session adjourns. Those who are familiar with the course of legislation do not feel that any of these measures will justify long-drawn-out discussion. Certainly, there will be no excuse for such delay in their consideration as will unduly prolong the session. I wish to emphasize now that any such delay will be influenced by political reasons and will not serve the best interests of the country. The administration has already expressed its hope for an early adjournment, and I feel sure that this will coincide with the wishes of Congress.

Had not the Constitution been changed with respect to the convening of the Congress, all legislation which it might be necessary to consider at this session would have had to be passed on during a 3-month period. I can see no reason, therefore, why all essential legislation cannot be fully, fairly, and deliberately considered within that time limit. Certainly, it seems to me that Congress should be able to adjourn during the month of April or the first part of May at the latest. I have no reason to anticipate that Members will permit political considerations to prevent an early adjournment. There is no doubt that this will meet with the hearty approval of business throughout the country and of the people generally.

First and foremost in the legislation which must be considered are the regular annual supply bills. There are nine of these appropriation or supply bills plus the customary deficiency bills, and including the deficiency bill which failed of passage at the last session because of the filibuster in the Senate. Until the President forwards his Budget message, which will be done as soon as Congress assembles, it will not be possible to indicate the amount of the Budget recommendations. Under the direction of the able and efficient Chairman BUCHANAN, members of the important Appropriations Committee have been in Washington during the month of December conducting hearings, and my understanding is that several of these bills will be ready for consideration when Congress convenes.

SEES CUT IN APPROPRIATIONS

Despite the fact that there is some criticism of the growth of expenditures in recent years, I have no hesitation in prophesying that at the close of the coming session it will be found that there has been a reduction in appropriations for the next fiscal year, considerably below those which were made for the present fiscal year, and which, in my opinion, represents the peak of the administration's financial efforts to restore normal prosperity to the Nation. The fact of the business is that those who criticise expenditures strangely fail to make a distinction between expenditures for the current or ordinary operations of the Government, such as were made before the period of the depression and unemployment, and those made necessary by the depression to take care of the needy unemployed and their families, restore agriculture, increase the purchasing power of the people, and bring business and industry back to normalcy. It should be further said in defense of the Congress which voted these sums (and they were supported by both political parties) that critics seldom call attention to the fact that a great part of these appropriations are self-liquidating. They consist of large loans made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to faltering banks. Many of them needed help to prevent threatened utter collapse of the entire banking system, and they got it. The result is that banks are now on a sound and stable basis with a restoration of the old-time confidence of the people in their soundness.

Then there were loans made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to railroads threatened with bankruptcy, insurance companies, and other industries scattered over the country. There were increases in loans made to farmers by the Federal land bank to enable them to save their farms and to home owners for the same purpose. Advances have been made for rural resettlement, slum clearance, and to other agencies which provide work for the unemployed, and have brought about desirable improvements in various parts of the country. With returning prosperity—which is now at hand—practically all of these sums will be repaid with interest within the period fixed and will eventually be applied to the retirement of the bonds issued to provide the necessary funds.

The other expenditures—and they have been considerable—represent money which had to be advanced to feed the starving and clothe the naked during the days when it was impossible for millions of deserving citizens to secure work in order to provide for themselves and families. These are certainly not to be classed as expenditures for current, ordinary, and necessary operations of the Government. I venture to say that an investigation will show that the appropriations for current and ordinary operations of the Government, as they were known before the period of the depression, have been considerably decreased rather than increased.

OBLIGATION OF GOVERNMENT

Heretofore those who are unfortunate and who have needed help have been taken care of by local agencies and institutions supported by the local communities and by private charities. But the demands increased to such an extent during the depression and were of such Nation-wide scope, due to unemployment, that the Federal Government was confronted with this plain Christian duty which it had to assume. Enormous sums of money have been and are still being required to meet this obligation. With the return to normal conditions, the States and local communities should resume this obligation, which distinctly belongs to them, and care for those in their midst who actually deserve and need help. This cannot be regarded as a Federal function except in case of a national emergency.

I have referred to all of this in some detail simply to show that we may expect a continually reducing Budget and that business can have no reason to fear increased expenditures in the future. Certainly if there is proper cooperation on the part of capital and industry. The first legislative bill of major importance to come before the Congress will be the bill providing for the payment of the adjusted-compensation certificates, commonly known as the "bonus" bill. I think some measure of this kind will be passed by the Senate and the House during the month of January. There is an overwhelming sentiment in its favor in both Houses. It will be remembered that the so-called Patman bill finally passed the House and Senate by large majorities at the last session. It was vetoed by the President. The House voted to override the veto by a large majority, but the veto was sustained in the Senate by nine votes. Many leaders in both parties have declared that a bonus-payment bill will be enacted into law at the coming session. There is no doubt about this, if the contending forces in favor of the different bills get together and agree upon a measure. No one, of course, is qualified or authorized to speak on the subject of veto. That is a matter for the President alone, and I do not presume that he would permit himself to reach any conclusion as to the action he may take in the event such a bill is again passed by the Congress until it has been actually passed and the President has an opportunity to examine its provisions. No one can say what the result will be. Speculation, therefore, appears to me to be not only of no value but improper under the circumstances. It is very certain that the payment of the bonus bill will be an issue and a more or less disturbing factor in legislation until it is paid. As one who has unhesitatingly followed the President on the subject, I hope it may be possible to agree upon some bill which will at least in a measure reconcile the different lines of thought.

Another measure which will undoubtedly come forward early in the session will be a bill to extend the present neutrality law, which expires the latter part of February. This law was passed to preserve our peace with the world and to prevent our Nation becoming involved in conflicts which may arise among other nations, and in which we have neither voice nor personal concern. The chief issue which it appears will be involved and which will doubtless provoke discussion is whether the President will be vested with discretionary powers, or whether the terms of the law shall be made mandatory in the placement of embargoes on the shipment of materials which may be regarded as an aid to warring nations. It is not my intention in these remarks to discuss controversial matters of legislation, but I trust I may be permitted to say that, speaking, of course, for myself alone, I believe it will be a grave mistake to pass a mandatory law on the subject specially as to commodities. I believe the discretion should be left to the President to determine what shall be the subject of embargo and when and where it should be applied. To do otherwise, it seems to me, would be a grave mistake, and I say this as one who favors keeping the country at peace and one who would do anything short of surrendering our national honor or the loss of our own self-respect as a Nation to insure peace. There are several reasons which cause me to feel this way. It will be impossible for me to present them here. Let me say, however, that I can foresee the possibility of serious injustice being done our own trade in many products and materials which are of vital concern to our people, without in any way helping to restore peace among warring nations. The embargo might have to be applied when Congress was not in session or immediately if Congress is in session. I think it important that discretion should be vested in someone to act in the light of what other nations are doing, and what is the best interest of our Nation, and not to bring about a situation whereby, under mandatory provisions, our trade may be put at a disadvantage and we would fail to receive trade benefits all other nations are enjoying. The only real objection made to the vesting of this discretionary power in the Chief Executive, other than the old one of "too much power in one man", is that it would afford an opportunity to a President to involve us in foreign conflicts and possibly war. This is ridiculous in the extreme. Why should anyone be so much alarmed over merely giving to the President discretionary power over embargoes to belligerent nations when, under our Constitution, he has by far greater powers as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy and could involve us in war any time if he so desired?

STRONGER NATIONAL DEFENSE

There will undoubtedly be some discussion and possibly action will be taken toward strengthening our national defense. The disturbed conditions in various parts of the world make it very certain that this subject will be brought to the front in some very definite way, perhaps in the War and Navy appropriation bills. One powerful nation has its armies now on the soil of another less powerful, and frankly avows its intention of taking over control of all or a portion of the smaller nation's territory for its own purposes. Another powerful nation in the Far East, by force of arms and intrigue, is gradually dismembering the extensive empire of one of the most peacefully inclined of all the people of the world, and there are disturbing rumors of other complications which threaten the peace of the entire world.

The horrors of the World War seem to have been already forgotten by some of the nations of the world. What should be the disposition of our country in view of the turmoil and warlike demonstrations to the east and the west of us? Happily it has determined to steer clear of these foreign quarrels and entanglements. I do not subscribe to the sentiments recently expressed to the effect that war is probable between our country and one of these nations. Even if, as was alleged, that nation were so disposed, it has troubles nearer its own border which must first be looked after. I do not believe that there is any immediate danger of our country becoming involved in any of these or other foreign complications. Our people are opposed to war and will not look with tolerance upon anyone who seeks to involve our Nation in the conflicts of other countries. There is a very strong feeling, however, that this country should be prepared for any unexpected eventuality and that it should be second to none in its defenses; that the surest way to guarantee our peace is to be ready for any contingency. I am frank to say that I am in sympathy with this view.

We have an extended coast line both on the East and the West, and are open to attack either from the sea or the air on all sides. I am perfectly well aware that there are a good many loyal citizens who do not agree with this view, and who feel that we should really decrease rather than increase our armaments for defense, but I have always believed that reasonable preparedness, so long as other nations are increasing their armaments, is the best and surest guaranty of peace. Certainly so long as the present unrest and warlike conditions prevail, it seems to me that we should keep our land, air, and naval forces up to the proper standard and be unsurpassed in our ability to protect ourselves in the event of attack. We all hope, of course, that the time to advocate such action is when other nations for one reason or another are increasing their fighting strength.

One question which is agitating the public mind at the present time is the Townsend old-age-pension plan. Undoubtedly this movement has gained strength in certain portions of our country and efforts will be made in the coming session to bring it to the front. The proposal to pay $200 per month to a person when he reaches the age of 60 years is an attractive one and enlists many supporters who do not stop to consider the difficulty and the impossibility of financing. Its supporters have proposed a 2-percent tax upon all transactions which would greatly increase the cost of living for the masses of people, and at the same time would, so the experts tell us, fall far short of raising revenue necessary to take care of the tremendous obligation which would be imposed by the passage of the Townsend plan. It is said that the passage of such a law would cost $24,000,000,000 annually, or about one-third of our total national income, which is to be paid to only 7 percent of our population. It hasn't any chance of passage. The Congress, at the last session, passed an old-age-pension bill. It is to be administered in cooperation with the States, which should properly share in the responsibility of caring for those who in their old age find it impossible to get along without help.

LAUDS A. A. A. RESULTS

There will be legislation on other subjects to which I have not alluded. Other measures may be made necessary by future developments. Several of the so-called New Deal measures are now being tested in the Supreme Court. Among these is the A. A. A., which has rendered such signal and outstanding service to the agricultural interests. It is to be hoped and is expected that this act will be sustained. If not, Congress will undoubtedly feel the necessity of passing an amended act because of great good accomplished for agriculture in restoring fair prices to the farmer. It has been one of the most helpful of all the so-called New Deal legislation. Conditions prevailing at the present time are quite different from those prevailing a year ago when Congress met for its first session. At that time there was a hope that amounted to a certainty upon the part of a great many that recovery was at hand. Everything pointed to the return of prosperity, but it was not actually in sight. Today there can be no mistake. To show that the New Deal has not been the failure as pictured by some, let us read from an editorial which recently appeared in an important newspaper as to business this year: "General Motors cuts a holiday bonus of $5,000,000 for 200,000 employees, and many other corporations do likewise in ratio to their increased earnings." "Farmers' cash income has increased 86 percent, and rural retail sales have advanced 95 percent since the spring of 1933." "United States exports in November were 22 percent larger than in October and 38 percent larger than in November of last year." "In New England business volume was from 10 to 15 percent above last fall." "December retail sales are running nearly a half billion dollars above sales of December 1934 and nearly a billion above sales of December 1933." "November building construction was 89 percent better than the same month last year, and residential construction was up 129 percent." "The number of jobs filled by workers rose in the year from 38,700,000 to 40,000,000. Wages and salaries rose correspondingly. Stock dividends increased about $250,000,000, and the value of stocks held by investors rose 11 billions." "People with savings deposits possess about a billion dollars more than last year."

It might have been added that there was hardly a class of business which did not show a greater output than during any year since 1929 and that reports from all over the country show that the sales during the present Christmas have been greater than at any time during the past 7 years. Yes; recovery is here. It has come so quickly since it first started that many who are now enjoying its benefits seem to have entirely forgotten the manner in which it was accomplished.

THE SO-CALLED "BONUS"

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio speech to be made this evening at 7 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, permission having been granted, I insert herewith a speech I delivered over the National Broadcasting Co.'s radio hook-up Friday evening, January 3, 1936, at 7 o'clock, eastern standard time, on the question of paying the adjusted-service certificates, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen, I desire to thank the National Broadcasting Co. for the generous use of its facilities.

The second Monday after the meeting of this Congress, which is January 13, it will be in order for a motion to be made that the House of Representatives immediately consider H. R. 1, the Patman bill, to pay three and a half million World War veterans the remainder due on their adjusted-service certificates, or so-called "bonus." It will require about $2,000,000,000 to make this payment after deducting the principal of prior loans. Under the rules of the House of Representatives, the Speaker will recognize me at that time, in view of the fact that a majority of the Members of the House have heretofore signed a motion for that purpose.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY HOUSE MEMBERS JOINT AUTHORS

It is a matter of small concern to me or to the veterans whether I am the author of the particular bill that pays the debt. It is not pride of authorship that we are interested in. At least 150 Members of the House of Representatives are just as much entitled to be known as joint authors of the Patman bill as myself. For many years we have all worked together on this proposal. For several years in the House I have been aided and assisted by a steering committee. This committee is composed of the following Members:

ABE MURDOCK, of Utah, secretary; ADOLPH J. SABATH, Illinois; JAMES G. SCRUGHAM, Nevada; ARTHUR H. GREENWOOD, Indiana; WILLIAM M. COLMER, Mississippi; JENNINGS RANDOLPH, West Virginia; CLARENCE CANNON, Missouri; WILLIAM P. CONNERY, Jr., Massachusetts; WILLIAM M. BERLIN, Pennsylvania; FRANK HANCOCK, North Carolina; JED JOHNSON, Oklahoma; JAMES P. RICHARDS, South Carolina; GERALD J. BOILEAU, Wisconsin; ANDREW J. MAY, Kentucky; FRED H. HILDEBRANDT, South Dakota; MARTIN F. SMITH, Washington; MARTIN DIES, Texas; JOHN E. MILLER, Arkansas; GEORGE A. DONDERO, Michigan; PAUL J. KVALE, Minnesota; ROY E. AYERS, Montana; and myself, chairman.

I am personally greatly indebted to the members of this committee for their very able, loyal, and effective support in this cause. Without this good steering committee, success would not have been possible. Our committee will refuse to be involved in a fight over authorship.

DEBT PAST DUE

It is my belief that any fair-minded American citizen can be convinced that this debt should be paid now. During the last 6 years I have gone into every State in the Union and visited all the principal cities in support of this legislation. There has been an increasing tide of public sentiment in its favor. In 1931 our strength was sufficient to enable the veterans to obtain a 50-percent loan. In 1932 our bill to pay in new money received 211 votes of the 435 in the House. In 1934 it received 295 of the 435 votes. In 1935 it received 318 votes of the 435 votes in the House. In the Senate its strength has also increased, our bill having received only 18 votes in that body in 1932 out of 96

Members. It received 31 votes in 1934 of the 96, and 55 votes—or 9 short of a two-thirds majority—in 1935. Remember that during this time except in 1935 there has been only one bill that has been insisted upon before Congress and before the country. That was a bill to pay the debt in new money, based upon an adequate gold reserve, without inflation and without issuing bonds or levying taxes. Although our bill received 75 percent of the combined votes of the two Houses of Congress during the last session, it lacked nine votes of receiving a two-thirds majority—sufficient to override a Presidential veto—in the Senate. This year I predict that any bill that does not levy new taxes will receive more than a two-thirds majority, whether it is our proposal to pay in new money or any other proposal. The bill that passes Congress will become a law.

THREE MAJOR VETERANS' ORGANIZATIONS AGREE

The national commanders of the American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, and Disabled American Veterans have been in conference here the last few days. They have agreed to support a bill which was introduced today by Congressman VINSON in the House, which proposes to authorize an appropriation to be made to pay the balance due on these certificates. It will allow the ones who desire to keep their certificates to receive 3-percent interest on what is due from the time the bill is enacted. In other words, the Government will issue bonds to them instead of paying their money. The bill is substantially like the Vinson bill of last year except this change.

OUR GROUP WANTS METHOD CONSIDERED

The Steering Committee for H. R. 1, the Patman bill, had a meeting and agreed that we should like to go along with this proposal if we could get consideration of our method of payment when the appropriation is considered after this bill becomes a law, if it should become a law. The rules of the House, however, are against us and we cannot support the legislation without foregoing the only opportunity we have of getting our method of payment considered. Therefore, the supporters of the Patman bill had a meeting in the caucus room this morning and decided that we would make every effort to get consideration of our plan of payment on any bill that is presented to Congress, although we did not go on record against any other bill. In other words, we are all agreed on the first objective—full and immediate cash payment without reduction of interest on loans. Our group has a secondary objective, that is, the payment in Government currency without the issuance of more bonds or the levying of more taxes. The Vinson bill will require $2,000,000,000 in bonds to be issued.

AUTHORSHIP NOT MATERIAL

It is my understanding that an effort is being made by the Vinson bill supporters to get it considered in the House before our bill is considered on January 13. If the effort, which I shall not oppose, is successful, I will be deprived of the authorship of the measure. This will not meet with disapproval from me. I do not object to any other Member of Congress having authorship of this measure and I shall continue to fight just as hard for full and immediate cash payment regardless of who is the author of the bill.

SOLDIERS RECEIVED FEW CENTS A DAY

When we entered the World War in 1917 a Selective Service Act was passed which required young men to serve their country. Their pay was fixed at $1 a day for home service and 10 cents more each day for service overseas. The soldier did not actually receive the amount promised him—$30 a month. If he had dependents, he was usually forced to allot $15 a month of his pay to his dependents. This caused a deduction of one-half of his pay at the end of the month. He was also forced to pay for insurance, averaging $6.60 a month, which was likewise deducted from his pay. He paid for altering and mending his clothing and shoes; barber bills; laundry bills; and other incidental bills. When these deductions were made the average soldier received a very small sum, if anything, at the end of the month. It is true that the Government paid for his maintenance. Secretary of War, Newton D. Baker, testified before the House Appropriations Committee in 1918 that it cost the Government $154 a year for maintenance for each soldier, including food and clothing. This was less than 50 cents a day. Without further argument one is convinced, in view of these facts, that the soldier received but a few cents a day for his services.

In 1924 Congress passed a law to adjust the pay of the World War veterans. It was agreed in this law that each veteran should receive another $1 a day for each day he served in this country and $1.25 a day extra for each day he served overseas. Add this amount to the amount a soldier has already received, including his maintenance, and it will make approximately $2.50 a day, including food and clothing, that the Government is paying each soldier for his services. Contrast this with the $8 to $20 a day received by civilians.

INTEREST FOR 7 YEARS IGNORED

The 1924 law which confessed the $1 a day extra to each veteran contained one serious mistake. It omitted 7 years' interest. Mr. Andrew Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, on January 28, 1931, when testifying before the Committee on Finance in the United States Senate, stated that, in computing the amount which was due each veteran, 7 years' interest was entirely ignored. This testimony may be found on page 62 of the hearings. I was present and heard the testimony. The 1924 act, instead of paying the veterans in cash the small, measley amount that was promised them as of the time they rendered the service, caused each veteran to be permitted to accept an adjusted-service certificate payable on January 1, 1945. Although the debt is payable in 1945, it is really past due as a matter of right and justice, because the 7 years' interest was ignored and the Government failed to allow 6-percent interest as it allows all others under similar circumstances, instead of 4-percent interest. After the war, income-tax payers had $3,000,000,000 refunded them on flimsy showings that they were entitled to it for depreciation in the value of properties, etc. On each refund, 6-percent interest was allowed, which is customary for the Government to pay. The soldiers are entitled to as much. They are not asking for more.

BABY BONDS

The United States Treasury is now selling baby bonds. The face amount of the bond is due in 1945 if purchased in 1935. Suppose the holder of one of those baby bonds should in 1945 discover that 7 years' interest had been omitted in computing his bond, and according to its terms he would not receive the full amount until 7 years later, or 1952. In such a case he would be entitled to ask for a revision of the terms of his bond in order that he may not be deprived of the 7 years' interest. This is exactly what the veterans are doing today. In calculating the amount due these veterans, 7 years' interest was ignored.

DEBT DUE IN 1931

If we will now correct the mistake that was made in 1924 and adjust the interest for the veterans so as to give them the same consideration—and no more—that all others received as interest on contracts growing out of the World War, each veteran is entitled to an amount equal to the full face of his certificate on October 1, 1931. In other words, we are merely asking for the $1 a day that Congress confessed, with a reasonable rate of interest from the time the services were rendered.

BANKERS GREATLY BENEFITED

No group in America has been helped more since March 4, 1933, than the big banking group, yet they demonstrated monumental gall and gross ingratitude at the recent New Orleans Convention of the American Bankers' Association and are now trying to chisel in on the payment of this debt. Let me tell you the benefits the banking group has received during this period:

(1) All the banks were closed on March 4, 1933. They owed the people $40,000,000,000, and had in their vaults only $1.75 for every $100 owed. Congress passed a law allowing the bankers to put up any sort of paper, collateral or no collateral, even their own demand notes, and get money printed on them in order that their doors might be opened. The credit of the Nation was being used absolutely free by the bankers, and they only paid 27 cents per thousand dollars for printing the money.

(2) All deposits of $5,000 or less have been guaranteed by an agency of the Government, the Government paying $300,000,000 of what can be termed the initial premium and the banks only $39,000,000 of the premium.

(3) The Government purchased half the stock in practically all the banks. This stock is tax-exempt. This has enabled the banks to get a 50-percent tax reduction during the depression, which no other group received.

(4) A law was passed relieving the banks of the obligation to pay interest on demand deposits, thereby saving them more than $250,000,000 a year.

(5) The Government has delivered to them Government bonds, tax-exempt, interest-bearing, for a bank's credit, which enables them to collect three-fourths of a billion dollars a year in interest from the Government, representing a pure bonus, subsidy, or gratuity.

BANKERS' DOLE

Therefore, the banks of the Nation during this depression have received a 50-percent tax reduction, a saving of $250,000,000 a year interest on demand deposits, collecting $750,000,000 a year interest on Government bonds that they are holding, enjoying a guaranty of their deposits practically at Government expense, and using the credit of the Nation absolutely free. The bankers have been and are now enjoying a Government dole equal to more than millions of poor and unfortunate people receive annually.

Considering all these benefits, the banking group has been well taken care of, and I see no reason why Congress should give them an additional "rake-off" or "grab" of $2,000,000,000 in order to pay a just and honest debt of $2,000,000,000 to the veterans of the World War.

HOUSE BILL 1 FOR IMMEDIATE PAYMENT

Our bill, H. R. 1, provides that each veteran who holds a certificate will get the remainder due him in cash immediately. Prior loans received on his certificate will be deducted, but no interest to be deducted on loans after October 1, 1931.

Government currency will be issued to pay the debt, and, as this form of Government currency is paid to the veterans, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, if he desires, to retire from circulation another form of Government currency—Federal Reserve notes—equal to the amount paid the veterans. This provision removes any chance of inflation, because as one form of money is paid to the veterans another form of money is retired. Therefore, the circulating medium will not necessarily be increased by one dollar. Anyone who charges that the bill is inflationary is either misinformed, uninformed, or is deliberately misrepresenting the facts. A bond bill that the bankers want will be inflationary.

MAY BE PAID IN GOLD

The daily statement of the United States Treasury today discloses that the Government has on hand more than $10,000,000,000 in pure gold and more than $1,000,000,000 in silver. According to existing law, the title to all gold is in the Government of the United States. Therefore, the Government possesses enough gold to set aside a 100-percent reserve to take care of all outstanding money and to then set aside $2,000,000,000 to pay the remainder due the veterans 100 cents on the dollar in gold, and still have more than $3,000,000,000 in idle gold and $1,000,000,000 in idle silver. In view of these undisputed facts, how can one contend that it would not be idiotic and imbecilic for the Government to issue more tax-exempt, interest-bearing bonds to pay the debt owed to the soldiers? If the debt is not paid in the manner we propose, it will take more bonds and more taxes to pay it. Practically all the $4,800,000,000 appropriated for public works has been allocated; only a very small sum remains in this fund. Therefore, the debt cannot be paid from this fund. A question remains: Will we pay the debt in Government currency, based upon a 100-percent gold reserve, or will we issue more nontaxable, interest-bearing bonds to pay it? Notice has been served on us by the administration that the bill providing for the payment must provide for the means of payment. Our plan is a sensible, sane, and reasonable plan. It will require neither bonds nor taxes to make the payment. If there is objection to printing the money based upon the gold, as Congressman RANKIN, of Mississippi, has pointed out, the payment can conveniently and safely be made in pure gold.

WEALTHY ESCAPE TAXATION

There are outstanding today tax-exempt obligations issued by the Federal, State, county, and city governments amounting to more than $50,000,000,000. The people who hold these obligations do not pay taxes on them. We are rapidly going in the direction of permitting the people who own the wealth of this Nation to go scot free of any sort of a tax and compelling others to pay taxes on what they owe and what they consume, in order to support our different governments. The issuance of nontaxable, interest-bearing bonds must be stopped. The time is opportune—it is now! The big bankers will object. They want their "drag" or "rake-off" on every debt or they will oppose the payment of the debt. Now is the time to start in the direction of the Government's issuing its own credit within limited bounds and reasonable limitations, according to the Constitution of the United States, instead of the Government's paying the bankers for the use of the Government's credit.

No longer should we permit the credit of this Nation to be farmed out for the use and abuse of a few big bankers.

PAYMENT NOW WILL HELP ENTIRE COUNTRY

In conclusion, may I repeat that the debt to the veterans is past due because 7 years' interest was ignored in computing the so-called "bonus" certificates; that the full amount should be paid now without deducting interest on loans since 1931? This will require the payment of $2,000,000,000 to the veterans, which will go into every nook and corner of the Nation. It will be new and added purchasing power that will quickly flow into the channels of trade and production and not only help the veterans, but help everybody. The payment can safely be made without bonds or taxes. It can even be made in pure gold, and the Treasury will still have sufficient gold to redeem all outstanding money and have on hand $4,000,000,000 in idle gold and silver. I hope those of you who are interested in this subject will let your Congressman and your Senator know whether you prefer this payment to be made in nontaxable bonds which will require taxes to be levied to pay the bonds and will permit the bankers to get a $2,000,000,000 bonus while the veterans are getting paid a $2,000,000,000 debt or whether you desire the payment to be made in Government currency based upon an adequate gold reserve and cause to be placed in circulation $2,000,000,000 which no one will be paying interest on while it is in circulation. Our first consideration is full and immediate cash payment. That is our first objective. We are secondarily interested in the method of payment. We believe that we can serve our country best by suggesting a method of payment that will not cause the imposition of more taxes or the issuance of more nontaxable interest-bearing bonds.

BEWARE

Beware of a contemplated bill that will substantially reduce the amount due and cause the payment to be made in dribs.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, at this time I ask unanimous consent to make a remark or two, probably only a sentence or two, and to have the Clerk read a letter written the other day by my secretary, in my absence, to Dr. Townsend. I think it is a very good letter and I feel that the House is entitled to hear it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. CITRON], who was taken ill a few weeks ago while visiting in Moscow. He is still confined to a hospital there, but I am informed by his office that he is rapidly recovering and it is expected he will resume his duties here by the middle of January. I ask that this leave of absence may stand until further notice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

THE LATE HUEY P. LONG

Mr. FERNANDEZ. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 378

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. HUEY P. LONG, a Senator of the United States from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE LATE HENRY M. KIMBALL

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 379

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. HENRY M. KIMBALL, a Representative from the State of Michigan.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE LATE THOMAS D. SCHALL

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 377

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL, a Senator of the United States from the State of Minnesota.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The resolution was agreed to.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I have just received a telegram from my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKEOUGH], who is today celebrating his silver wedding anniversary. He requests that I ask unanimous consent to have the wire sent me read, which gives the reasons why he cannot be here.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the telegram, as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., January 2, 1936.

Hon. A. J. SABATH,

New House Office Building:

Press reports indicate Republican National Committee, with its usual unbecoming conduct exposing its woeful lack of understanding of the Constitution, despite its constancy of claim to the contrary, will attempt to deny the President of the United States the courtesy to deliver his message on the state of the Union at an hour which will better insure his being heard by the largest possible number of citizens to whom it was intended under the Constitution such annual reports should be made by attempting through those Members of the House of Representatives the National Republican Committee controls to defeat rule which may be submitted to the Membership of the House of Representatives to grant the President of the United States the courtesy of convening at such time as he may request. Will you be good enough to pair me in favor of such?

Rule in order that the record of roll call which may be required under the rules of the House will show that in my absence, due to my silver wedding anniversary in Chicago, I desire to avail myself of the best possible substitute to show my protest as a Member of the House of Representatives and a citizen of the disgusting partisanship which the Republican National Committee is exhibiting. If possible for you to accomplish, would appreciate your incorporating this telegram in the proceedings of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 3.

Thank you.

R. S. MCKEOUGH, M. C.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts (interrupting the reading). Mr. Speaker, did the gentleman from Illinois make a unanimous-consent request with regard to a silver wedding anniversary? I think he secured permission under false pretenses.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. STEWART (at the request of Mr. HILL of Alabama), indefinitely, on account of death in his family.

To Mr. THOMASON, for 2 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. DUFFY, of New York, for 2 days, on account of illness.

To Mr. MONTET, for 10 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. CITRON, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. CARMICHAEL (at the request of Mr. HILL of Alabama), on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. HOBBS (at the request of Mr. HILL of Alabama), on account of important business.

AMERICAN MATERIALS FOR USE ON WORKS PROJECTS

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein correspondence between myself, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Chief of the Bureau of Public Roads.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, in the Federal works program which is now under way in the United States it is important that American manufactured materials be used. I desire to include the following correspondence between myself and Public Works Administrator Harold L. Ickes and officials of the Bureau of Public Roads on this subject:

NOVEMBER 13, 1935.

Hon. HAROLD L. ICKES,
Secretary of the Interior, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: It has been brought to my attention that German manufactured steel is proposed for use in the construction of Public Works Administration bridges in New York and North Carolina.

Although it is my understanding that the contracts for this steel are being handled through private contractors, it is my opinion that the Federal Administration should be able to execute an order or, at least, a request which would be heeded whereby American steel would be used in the construction of projects where Federal funds are being expended.

As a member of the Labor Committee of the House, I am most deeply interested in the further reemployment of American workmen.

Sincerely yours,

JENNINGS RANDOLPH.

FEDERAL EMERGENCY ADMINISTRATOR OF PUBLIC WORKS,
Washington, November 23, 1935.

Hon. JENNINGS RANDOLPH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. RANDOLPH: I have your letter of November 13 protesting against the purchase of German steel piling for use in constructing the Triborough Bridge.

It is not the intention, nor has it ever been the intention, of P. W. A. to permit the use of money voted by Congress for relief purposes to be used for the purchase of foreign materials on project construction. The order issued by this Administration relating to the use of domestic materials on P. W. A. projects requires the purchase of American materials in all cases except where the price of the American materials is unreasonable, as determined after comparison with the bids submitted on foreign materials. In an effort to fix a standard of reasonableness, certain differentials, by way of percentages, were established in favor of American materials. It was thought that these differentials, which are in addition to the tariffs, would preclude all foreign materials except in those cases in which the price of the American materials was exorbitant. On the other hand, in no circumstance does the order prescribed by this Administration require a contractor under a lump-sum contract to purchase foreign materials.

Nevertheless, you may be assured that this Administration has not and will not compel the Triborough Bridge Authority to approve or require the purchase of German steel for use in the construction of the Triborough Bridge. Furthermore, I am changing the order so as to provide that no foreign materials may be purchased on any P. W. A. non-Federal project without my express approval. That approval will be given only if the American bids are collusive or the prices are so unreasonably high as to justify the belief that advantage is being taken of the Government in administering its relief funds.

Sincerely yours,

(Sgd.) HAROLD L. ICKES,
Administrator.

NOVEMBER 27, 1935.

Hon. THOMAS H. MACDONALD,
Bureau of Public Roads, Willard Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MACDONALD: I have heard it rumored that foreign-manufactured asphalt and cement are being used in the construction of Federal roads under the works-relief funds.

I trust that no such condition exists; but if there is any indication of such practice, I believe a thorough investigation should be made immediately. I am certain it is the intention of the Congress and this administration to use American-made products in the works program.

With kindest personal regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

JENNINGS RANDOLPH.

DECEMBER 20, 1935.

Hon. JENNINGS RANDOLPH,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. RANDOLPH: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of November 27, relative to the use of foreign-manufactured asphalt and cement in the construction of highway projects and grade-crossing projects financed with Federal funds apportioned to the States and administered by this Bureau under the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935.

Rules and regulations to govern the expenditure of the above funds were approved by the Secretary and by the Works Progress Administrator on July 8, 1935, and by the President on July 12, 1935, one set of rules and regulations being approved for the grade-crossing projects and another set for the highway projects. Section 17 in each of these rules and regulations relates to the use of domestic materials and reads as follows:

"All contracts for projects shall provide that in the performance of the work the contractor, subcontractors, material producers or suppliers shall use only such unmanufactured articles, materials, and supplies as have been mined or produced in the United States, and only such manufactured articles, materials, and supplies as have been manufactured in the United States substantially all from articles, materials, or supplies mined, produced, or manufactured, as the case may be, in the United States, unless articles, materials, or supplies of the class or kind to be used, or the articles, materials, or supplies from which they are manufactured are not mined, produced, or manufactured, as the case may be, in the United States in sufficient and reasonably available commercial quantities and of a satisfactory quality: Provided, however, That if the Bureau of Public Roads shall find that in respect to some particular articles, materials, or supplies, it is impracticable to make such requirement, or that it would unreasonably increase the cost, an exception shall be noted in the specifications as to those particular articles, materials, or supplies, and a public record shall be made of the findings which justified the exception."

The required special provisions which are a part of the specifications for each and every project submitted make an exception to the provisions of section 17 as follows:

"The contractor hereby warrants that all unmanufactured articles, materials, and supplies offered herewith have been mined or produced in the United States, and that all manufactured articles, materials, and supplies offered have been manufactured in the United States substantially all from articles, materials, or supplies mined, produced, or manufactured, as the case may be, in the United States, unless articles, materials, or supplies of the class or kind to be used, or the articles, materials, or supplies from which they are manufactured are not mined, produced, or manufactured, as the case may be, in the United States in sufficient and reasonably available commercial quantities and of a satisfactory quality. It has been determined with respect to asphaltic materials for highway purposes manufactured in the United States, that it is impracticable to apply the above requirements."

You will note that cement is not exempted from the quoted provisions of the regulations and the exemption as to asphaltic materials applies only to such materials as are "manufactured in the United States" from imported crudes.

Asphaltic materials, whether produced from domestic or imported crude, constitute the product of the second manufacturing process. In other words, crude oil which has been imported, as well as domestic oil, goes through the first manufacturing process by which the so-called primary products are taken off, such as gasoline, kerosene, and benzine, and the residue from which asphaltic materials are made is run into vats or storage tanks where it is held until orders are received for asphaltic materials, and it is then withdrawn and put through another manufacturing process, complete in itself, by which the asphaltic materials are produced. We do not consider that the exemption of asphaltic materials for highway purposes manufactured in the United States is in conflict with any legislative requirements on this subject.

The Bureau will give prompt and careful consideration to any specific instances of departure from the above regulations and special provisions which may be brought to its attention.

Very truly yours,

P. ST. J. WILSON,
Acting Chief of Bureau.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include certain excerpts.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what are these excerpts?

Mr. McFARLANE. They are certain excerpts in regard to matters that have occurred in my own district.

Mr. RICH. Are they newspaper articles?

Mr. McFARLANE. No; they are not newspaper articles.

Mr. RICH. What are they?

Mr. McFARLANE. They have reference to certain matters that have occurred in my own district with respect to a municipal lighting plant that we are trying to build at Wichita Falls, Tex.

Mr. RICH. Does the gentleman expect the Government to build a plant somewhere in Texas?

The regular order was demanded.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a very brief excerpt from a statement in the Boston Post by Mr. Kellogg, of Kellogg Corn Flakes, explaining the virtues of the 30-hour week in his concern.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, by reason of the unavoidable absence of my colleague the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON], I ask unanimous consent that he may be granted a leave of absence.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for leave of absence for my colleague the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WHITE] on account of his unavoidable absence due to automobile trouble in driving across the country.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

WOODROW WILSON

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a brief eulogy by me on Woodrow Wilson commemorating his last speech, which was made in my home city, Pueblo, Colo.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted by the House, I insert in the RECORD a eulogy on Woodrow Wilson delivered by me recently in the City Auditorium at Pueblo, Colo. The occasion of this eulogy was the installation in the building of a memorial tablet reciting the fact that in this building Woodrow Wilson, then President of the United States, in September 1919 delivered his last speech. The tablet was the work of the Woodrow Wilson Club of Pueblo, under the leadership of Mrs. Emma Hammond.

The eulogy is as follows:

It is with me always a solemn thought that in this building and on this platform Woodrow Wilson made his last speech. Here a great President of the United States appeared before his people for the last time. It marks this building as not only an historic but a sacred spot. It is highly fitting that a memorial tablet should be installed to publish to the world and to remind us of this dramatic national event, and the Woodrow Wilson Club of Pueblo is to be congratulated for this patriotic service.

I recall three of the outstanding events in the life of Woodrow Wilson which I was permitted to witness: His nomination for President at Baltimore; his inauguration as President in the Senate Chamber at Washington; and his last speech delivered from this platform in September 1919.

As he stood here he seemed to be in the full vigor and command of his mental and physical powers, but within an hour the physical man which supported his indomitable will had broken and the work of Woodrow Wilson was finished. The blade which could not be bent was broken. He paid with his life for one of the greatest ideals that ever stirred the mind and enthused the soul of a statesman, and he paid as truly as the soldier who falls on the field of battle.

I sat within a few feet of President Wilson and heard his last fervent and eloquent plea for the establishment of a world agency of peace between the peoples of the world. I have said that when he left this platform the work of Woodrow Wilson was finished, but it will never be finished so long as the great ideal to which he gave his life is unrealized among men. He was the prophet of a new order of relationships among the peoples and the nations of the world. It was not a new hope in the hearts of mankind, but it was given to him to be the voice of that hope in words still ringing round the world and which will ring down the generations so long as mass murder in the name of war between the nations finds a place among the activities of men. Woodrow Wilson has been in his grave for 14 years and today the great instrumentality of his wonderful mind is stirring the heart of the world with the hope that it may accomplish the end for which he designed it. Today it is not the scoff of cynics, but the hope of humanity, and if it fails, it will be the failure of humanity.

Woodrow Wilson was well fitted for the great role which fate thrust upon him. He was one of the two most scholarly men who ever reached the Presidency, the other being Thomas Jefferson. He was a profound student of history. He had a deep insight into causes and the relationships of the societies of the world. He had a mind unsurpassed in clearness and logic. After Secretary of State Robert Lansing left the Cabinet he wrote a series of four articles on Woodrow Wilson, and while the relationship between these two men had suffered under the stresses of those trying times, he did his former Chief justice. In one article he dealt with the part played by Wilson in the councils of what was known at Versailles as the "Big Four", representing the United States, England, France, and Italy.

These were the men who came to grips to make the final decisions in the settlement of the World War. Mr. Lansing said that after a discussion at the round table had disclosed the trend of thought of the "Big Four", Woodrow Wilson seized his pad and pencil and in scriptlike characters and with seldom the change of a word, put in final form in clear and simple English the composite thought of the group. His mind functioned with unerring precision, the result of an original endowment of brain, of will, and of character, brought to full fruition by a life of study, thought, and preparation.

Every man must have within him the intimations of natural religion and of faith in an overruling Providence. Mine is that when the hour strikes the man appears. I believe, as firmly as I believe anything, that George Washington was providential. The history of the Revolutionary War shows that at crucial times he carried the entire load on his shoulders, that Washington had only to lay down his sword and the Revolution was ended. I believe that Lincoln was providential, that that great mind and heart came forth from the processes that mold our destinies to save this great Nation in its supreme test. And I believe that Woodrow Wilson was a response to the age-long hope of mankind that war should give place to agencies of peace as the arbiter between the nations and the peoples of the earth.

Woodrow Wilson has been criticized for going to Paris. The wisdom and propriety of his venture is still a matter of controversy. But it is clear now that if he had not gone 60 nations would not be standing together today to avert another world cataclysm. It is claimed that he made too great concessions to get the Covenant of the League to those who were primarily interested in the spoils of war and that that was the price of the Covenant. But if the instrumentality which he created prevents another war, the price paid will not be too great. And if the League does not prevent another war, the war will come, not because of it, but in spite of it. Universal peace awaits the will, not of all men, but of enough men. They will tie up the dogs of war.

Woodrow Wilson has another side than that of the international relationships of nations He was one of three social-minded Presidents. Theodore Roosevelt was the first, and the man now in the White House is the third. I have heard it stated more than once that had not the World War intervened, Woodrow Wilson would have completed a program of social justice and reform which might have averted, at least in large measure, the disaster from which this country has not yet fully emerged. There is no difference in philosophy and principle between the Square Deal of Theodore Roosevelt, the New Freedom of Woodrow Wilson, and the New Deal of Franklin D. Roosevelt. Any apparent differences are merely due to the growth of the evil which brought these philosophies to the fore. Woodrow Wilson's work for social justice and reform as Governor of New Jersey made him President. It was his ambition to transcribe his statutes of New Jersey upon the statute books of the Nation. The present Congress has just strengthened the great instrumentality of finance he created, the Federal Reserve System. The seed he planted lives. It is growing nationally and internationally. It will continue to spread and the people will find greater shelter and security under its growth.

The first session of the Seventy-third Congress passed a resolution authorizing the President to cause the United States to be represented in the International Labor Organization, an agency to collect and disseminate information on labor conditions throughout the world. This Congress passed a small appropriation for the expense of the representation of this country in that Organization. It provoked a violent attack from Members of Congress who deal in international hate. This attack stirred me to a brief defense of Woodrow Wilson. I can think of no more fitting conclusion to this eulogy than to quote the closing paragraphs of my remarks.

"Woodrow Wilson was eternally right and, as sure as the rising of the morning sun, time will vindicate him. He said he was playing for the verdict of mankind, and the verdict of mankind will be for him.

"Woodrow Wilson ranks with Thomas Jefferson as among those world statesmen who belong to the future of all peoples. Only America could give two such men to the world. Thomas Jefferson stated in final form the true relationship between man and government. Woodrow Wilson stated in form as final the true relationship between nation and nation. His enunciation of the right of the self-determination of peoples has already given the world new nations. His 14 points have given the world a charter of international relationships which will be studied and followed by statesmen centuries after the critics of Woodrow Wilson have all been forgotten. His is the one enduring name that came out of the World War. He lighted a new torch to guide the feet of mankind toward the goal of universal brotherhood, toward the day envisioned by the poet:

" 'Til the war drum throbbed no longer
And the battle flags were furled,
In the parliament of man,
The federation of the world."

THE MUNICIPAL LIGHT PLANT ELECTION AT WICHITA FALLS, FEBRUARY 8, 1936—SHALL THE PEOPLE RULE OR WILL THEY BE RULED BY THE POWER TRUST?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. McFARLANE], as I understand they are his own remarks.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, the citizens of Wichita Falls, like those of many other cities throughout the Nation, have throughout the history of the city been paying exorbitant and unreasonable electric-light rates.

For years the city has been trying to secure a fair rate for electricity from the power company without success. So powerful are the utilities and other special-interest groups in Texas that no regulatory commission has ever been allowed to be created with proper authority to really regulate the rates of the utilities. Realizing the hopelessness of any relief from Austin, as soon as this administration came into power, and realizing that our great leader in the White House, Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt, favored adequate regulation for the utilities, and in the absence of same, municipal ownership, as being the only other alternative to secure lower rates, the citizens of Wichita Falls made an earnest fight in the city election of 1933 and again in 1935, when they were successful in electing a city council whole-heartedly pledged to secure the erection of a municipal light plant.

MAYOR YOUNG'S ATTITUDE THEN

On January 12, 1935, I received the following telegram from Mayor Young:

Our city is very desirous of building a municipal light plant and securing Government loan for same. Please write us particulars regarding the proper steps for us to take immediately to try to secure these funds.

To which I immediately replied that day, forwarding P. W. A. Circular No. 2, giving complete information concerning the necessary steps to be taken for filing application for a municipal light plant.

THE MAYOR AND THE CITY COUNCIL UNANIMOUS FOR MUNICIPAL LIGHT PLANT THEN

The mayor and the city council immediately employed well-qualified engineers and began the preparation of the city's application to be filed with the Federal authorities to construct a municipal light plant at Wichita Falls.

On February 2, 1935, the city council unanimously passed the following resolutions:

Whereas the City Council of Wichita Falls for months has been endeavoring to secure fair and reasonable light and power rates for the city of Wichita Falls from the Texas Electric Service Co. without any material success; and

Whereas the existing light rates charged the people of this city by such company are excessive and entirely out of line with the cost of production of such electrical energy, and it now appears that competition is the most effective weapon for securing adequate relief for the citizens and firms of Wichita Falls; and

Whereas Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, has asked all American cities which are desirous of building municipal light plants as a means for producing and supplying the citizens of such cities with fair and reasonable light rates, to apply to the Federal Government for financial help and assistance in promoting such municipal light plants: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the City Council of Wichita Falls, That we go on record as favoring the construction of a municipal light plant for Wichita Falls; that we secure the help and cooperation of the Federal Government in the construction and building of the same; and that we feel the people of this city have expressed by an election duly held for this proposition, an overwhelming endorsement of such a plan, and we call upon the citizens of Wichita Falls for their full help and cooperation in this matter.

CITY COUNCIL UNANIMOUSLY PASS ORDINANCE, AND MAYOR APPROVES SAME, FOR MUNICIPAL LIGHT PLANT

On the same day, ordinance no. 1193 was unanimously passed and approved by the city council and signed by the mayor, authorizing the city to issue its certificates of indebtedness to the Federal Government and pledge the income arising from said plant to pay for same. This ordinance, as shown from the application on file and the records in the city clerk's office at Wichita Falls, clearly shows that the application submitted by the city authorities is identically the same proposition that I have finally been able to get approved for the citizens of Wichita Falls, which they will be called to vote upon February 8, with these exceptions:

The original application was for a loan of $1,620,000, and a grant of $600,000, totaling $2,220,000. After a careful study the Federal authorities finally approved a loan of $1,260,000 at 4 percent, with an outright gift of $490,000. You will note the original application lacked $66,600 of requesting the 30-percent grant from the Federal authorities.

The next big difference between the application filed and as finally approved is the difference in the payments provided in the application as filed and the loan and grant as finally approved, which difference in payments is as follows:

Year	Application as filed	Application as finally approved
1936	$64,800	None
1937	64,800	None
1938	114,800	$5,000
1939	112,800	5,000
1940	120,800	5,000
1941	118,400	10,000
1942	131,000	10,000
1943	128,000	10,000
1944	125,000	16,667
1945	122,000	16,667
1946	144,000	16,667
1947	140,000	18,750
1948	136,000	18,750
1949	132,000	18,750
1950	128,000	18,750
Total payments for next 15 years	1,782,400	170,001

Thus it will be seen that competent engineers for the city of Wichita Falls, based on known electric consumption there, agreed that the city was able to pay $1,782,400 within the next 15 years. The application as finally approved by the Government requires that only $170,001 be paid within this same period of time.

After the passage of the resolutions, ordinances, and all other matters contained in the municipal light plant application as above mentioned, the city council sent the chairman of the light-plant committee and the counsel for utility matters to Washington to formally file same, which application was filed here in Washington on February 5 with Secretary Ickes. Upon returning to Wichita Falls the city council passed the following resolution:

Whereas Alderman Mack Taylor and Judge B. D. Sartin have just returned from Washington, D. C., where they successfully presented the application of the city of Wichita Falls, Tex., for a P. W. A. loan for building a municipal light plant; and

Whereas their visit to Washington was greatly expedited by the great help and friendly courtesy of Hon. John N. Garner, Vice President of the United States, Senator Morris Sheppard, Senator Tom Conally, Congressman James P. Buchanan, and Congressman W. D. McFarlane, and largely through the efforts of these men, together with the great help and assistance of our own fellow citizen, the Honorable James V. Allred, Governor of Texas, the foregoing application for a loan of $2,220,000 was received by Hon. Harold L. Ickes and filed for immediate action: Therefore be it Resolved by the Board of Aldermen of Wichita Falls, Tex., That we go on record expressing our thanks to the city representatives, Judge B. D. Sartin and Hon. Mack Taylor, for their fine work in behalf of the city, and that a special letter of thanks and appreciation be written to Texas Senators, Congressmen, and to Vice President Garner and Gov. James V. Allred, expressing our deep appreciation for their fine cooperation and help in successfully presenting the city's application for the above-mentioned P. W. A. project; and that our city secretary be instructed to write such letters to each of said parties, enclosing a copy of this resolution. Passed and approved this 4th day of February, A. D. 1935.

BASED ON ELECTION, THE COUNCIL PLEAD FOR PLANT

On April 3, 1935, the city council wrote me as follows:

WICHITA FALLS, TEX., April 3, 1935.

Representative W. D. MCFARLANE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MCFARLANE: We thought you might be interested in knowing that yesterday in the city election of Wichita Falls our three aldermen up for reelection who have vigorously supported municipal ownership of our city light plant, and who have heartily endorsed the national administration, were reelected by an overwhelming majority, receiving approximately 80 percent of the entire vote cast.

We are enclosing a clipping from the local daily paper showing the results of the election.

The strongest part of the New Deal administration at Washington has been the stand of the President on utilities. We believe that President Roosevelt's attitude on municipal ownership and on the outlawing of holding companies will be his main fort for reelection in 1936.

We feel that we are near the pulse of the people of Texas when we advocate the building of a municipal light plant and other municipally owned utilities out of the public-works funds.

We wish that you would see that a large part of this money is earmarked and set aside for municipally owned projects. These projects will be self-liquidating and will take most of the men from the relief rolls from Wichita Falls and other large cities of Texas. This will do more for promoting national recovery than any other way this money can be spent.

As you know, we have had on file our application for P. W. A. funds to erect a municipal light plant at Wichita Falls, and we trust that you will do all in your power to speed up the granting of this loan.

Appreciating your courtesy and consideration of this matter, we are,

Yours very truly,

MACK TAYLOR,
L. C. ROGERS,
CLAUDE MILLER,
J. B. STOKES,
MARK D. WALKER,
VIC STAMPFLI,
Aldermen.

B. D. SARTIN,
Special Counsel on Utility Matters.

WHY THE CHANGE OF HEART?

I could proceed through a very voluminous file and quote many letters and telegrams to show that the city council and the special counsel on utility matters were wholeheartedly for this municipal light plant program until after the adjournment of the last session of Congress. I was requested on October 28 by the city council to make a report of the status of the light, gas, and water applications of the city on file with the Government and their prospect of approval. After making this report the city council passed a resolution authorizing me to pledge a sufficient amount of the water revenues and see if the Government would reconsider and approve their application for a municipal light plant on that basis.

I drove my car to Washington at my own expense and personally presented this new proposition to the Federal authorities, and finally secured the approval of their application, not for $2,220,000, which included $111,000 engineers' fees and $33,000 attorneys' fees, with other unnecessary expenses, and after eliminating $470,000 unnecessary expenses, I finally secured the approval of their application for a loan of $1,260,000 and an outright gift or grant of $490,000.

STABBED IN THE BACK

While I was in Washington presenting this matter I found Mr. Sartin was giving the following statement to the Wichita Falls Record News:

SARTIN SKEPTICAL OF P. W. A. APPLICATION

B. D. Sartin, special attorney for the city in utility matters, appeared not greatly impressed Tuesday when he read the above dispatch of the activities of Representative W. D. MCFARLANE in behalf of a $2,220,000 loan for the city of Wichita Falls.

"Mr. MCFARLANE's trip is largely political", said Judge Sartin.

"I should be greatly surprised if he secured as much as $2.20 * * *."

When I finally secured the approval of this project, as above stated, for $1,750,000, of which $490,000 is an outright gift from the Government, Mr. Sartin and the so-called "little three", Young, Stampfli, and Walker, assisted and abetted by the so-called taxpayers committee, composed of Shields Heyser, J. L. Jackson, Jr., and A. W. King, began to bitterly oppose the election which was set for December 11, 1935. The principal reason given by all these parties was the pledge of a small part of the water revenue to insure the payment.

AFTER WATER REVENUES REMOVED POWER TRUST FIGHTS ON

Now that any pledge of the water revenues has been completely eliminated and the citizens have the opportunity of voting on the identical proposition they originally wanted, only on much more liberal terms, stripped of any extra graft, why do you suppose they are all apparently well financed and reorganized to fight this coming election? Do you suppose it is the voice of Jacob—the Texas Electric Service Co.—through the hand of Esau that is trying to deceive you again, and thus rob the citizens of Wichita Falls of perhaps the last opportunity they will have to vote to secure for themselves their own light plant, which will guarantee lower light rates?

THE PROPOSITION IS SOUND; THE PEOPLE NEED THE WORK

In their application to the Government the city authorities made this statement:

"Financially the proposition is sound. After making a considerable reduction in electric-service rates, the most conservative assumptions show a large margin of income above operating, maintenance, and sinking fund."

In answer to their statements being made that the plant is an unnecessary experiment, we find their application to the Government contains this statement:

"At present the city of Wichita Falls obtains electric service from the Texas Electric Service Co. Although there is a generating plant in Wichita Falls, which is kept ready as a stand-by, electric energy is brought to the city over transmission lines from generating stations located more than 100 miles away. Interruption of service is frequent and annoying; and at one time during the past year the city's water service was completely interrupted for a considerable time, due to transmission-line trouble, which stopped the electrically driven pumps, constituting a tremendous fire hazard.

"Lower electric rates than those now in effect are desired to reduce the necessary cost of living. A publicly owned utility is operated with rates as low as possible, and profits are used to defray expenses that would otherwise have to be met with taxation. A privately owned utility is operated with rates as high as possible, without losing customers, and profits are used for dividends to stockholders and extra dividends under the guise of management fees to holding companies; and excess profits are used for economically unsound extensions and improvements on which to claim a reasonable profit when criticized by commissions and legal authorities.

"From an employment standpoint, this project will afford a great amount of labor on the construction of a useful and permanent employment. After the project is completed it will furnish employment for many skilled men operating engines and maintaining the system."

NATIONALLY KNOWN—SARTIN AND HOWARD

As to the statements being made by the special city attorney that the city's bonds could easily be sold to private investors, we find that the light-plant application on file, under section (p) of his legal data, he submitted the following statement:

It is my opinion the proposed bonds cannot be negotiated.

Under section (Y) we find that the special utilities' attorney admits he is of "national standing."

Some time ago we find Mr. Ed Howard, president of Wichita Falls' two daily newspapers, frequently referred to as "nationally known." So it seems that now these two distinguished citizens have finally laid down in the same political bed together and each pledged to help the other to further help protect and guard the interests of the Power Trust.

AMONG HIGHEST LIGHT RATES IN TEXAS

According to the application on file, we have the power company charging among the highest light rates of any city of its size in Texas. The city council's resolutions of February 2 were adopted unanimously, as follows:

The charges made by the Texas Electric Service Co. for power and light service are entirely too high; * * * for the last several years the city of Wichita Falls has persistently tried to get the said Texas Electric Service Co. to reduce the said rates in keeping with other reductions in price, but to no avail.

According to the last report of the Federal Power Commission, Wichita Falls has the highest electric-light rates in the State for a city of its size. According to the information on file, the last 3 years the citizens of Wichita Falls have consumed more than an average of 20,000,000 kilowatt-hours annually, upon which the Texas Electric Service Co.'s gross collections have been considerably more than $2,000,000.

THE ELECTION FEBRUARY 8

The election held December 11 requiring the pledging of a small part of the water revenues has been eliminated. The question to be voted on February 8 is the identical question submitted under the original municipal light plant application agreed to and filed by the entire city council, and others, which is that the Federal Government under the city's application offers to loan the city $1,260,000 at 4 percent, and to give the city $490,000, all of which is to be used to construct a municipal light plant, the city to pledge only a sufficient amount of revenues from the light plant to meet the payments required, as stated above; this will amount to $170,001 for the next 15 years, it being clearly understood and as provided in the city's ordinances and the State statutes that in no event shall any taxes ever be levied to pay for any of this light-plant indebtedness. The light plant must pay for itself out of its own earnings, otherwise it belongs to the Government.

THE RECENT REDUCTION IN LIGHT RATES

Since the citizens of Wichita Falls have been fighting to erect their own municipal light plant, as has been done by 37 other cities in Texas and in more than 3,500 cities in the United States, the Texas Electric Service Co. has come forth with a slight reduction in their light rates, as follows:

Comparison of typical net monthly bills for Jan. 1, 1935, and Jan. 1, 1936, of Texas Electric Service Co., Wichita Falls, Tex. (residential service)

	Minimum bill	Monthly kilowatt-hour consumptions
		15	25	40	100	150	250	500
Jan. 1, 1935	[1] $1.00	$1.30	$1.90	$2.80	$5.80	$7.70	$9.95	$17.45
Jan. 1, 1936	[1] 1.00	1.35	1.85	2.60	5.40	6.90	9.40	14.40
Difference		+.05	−.05	−.20	−.40	−.80	−.55	−3.05
Percent difference		+3.8	−2.6	−3.6	−6.9	−10.4	−5.5	−17.4

[1] Including 10 kilowatt-hours.

New rate: Minimum bill $1 per month; 2 cents per day, and 5 cents per kilowatt-hour, first 90 kilowatt-hours per month; 3 cents per kilowatt-hour, next 110 kilowatt-hours per month; 2 cents per kilowatt-hour all additional kilowatt-hours per month.

NOTE.—All bills calculated under specifications used by the electric-rate survey of the Federal Power Commission. Bills for Jan. 1, 1936, calculated under rate schedule above.

The above rate comparison has been carefully checked and is correct. Thus, it will be seen that the rates on the small consumers have been increased, while the rates on large consumers have been slightly reduced.

Assuming that there are 10,000 light meters in the city of Wichita Falls under the 2-cents-per-day ready-to-serve charge, the light companies would receive more than $72,000 per year for furnishing no electricity whatever to the citizens. Add to this the new high rate schedule, as above stated, and it is costing the average citizen of Wichita Falls more than 7 cents per kilowatt for his current.

RATE COMPARISONS

On June 29, when the Wheeler-Rayburn bill, S. 2796, was before us, I spoke in favor of that measure, and called to the attention of the Congress the facts that the consumers of the Nation were being charged annually about $1,000,000,000 for electric current beyond what is the fair price for the current consumed. In speaking of the overcharge for Texas, I pointed out that, based on current consumed, we were paying more than $25,000,000 per year for electric light and power over what is considered a reasonable rate for the power consumed.

Assuming that my district consumes its pro-rata part of the power consumed in the State, this would mean that the consumers of electricity in the Thirteenth Congressional District are being forced to pay annually over $1,000,000 for electric current over what is considered a fair rate.

I further pointed out then, as well as at other times, the activities of the Power Trust lobby and how they have preyed upon all legislatures, State and National, and so far have been able to thwart the will of the people in securing reasonable utility rates.

In the speech of June 29 I compared the rates of each and every town in my district with the Tennessee Valley Authority rates, and showed the exact percentage of overcharges being forced upon the people by the power companies because of their control of all legislative branches of the Government.

I pointed out that this lobby control of the Power Trust is costing the consumers of electricity from two to four times as much as this service should cost them. Since the Power Trust in Wichita Falls has increased the rates on the small consumers and slightly reduced the rates on the large consumers, let us compare their present rates with those of cities of similar size in Texas:

Amarillo, 15 kilowatt-hours for $1.
Austin, 15 kilowatt-hours for $1.12.
Beaumont, 15 kilowatt-hours for $1.28.
Galveston, 15 kilowatt-hours for 90 cents.
Port Arthur, 15 kilowatt-hours for $1.28.
Wichita Falls, 15 kilowatt-hours for $1.35.

Thus showing that Wichita Falls still has the highest rate of any of the above cities for the services rendered.

MUNICIPAL LIGHT PLANT CITIES IN TEXAS

It should be very gratifying to the 37 cities in Texas owning their own municipal light plants that each and every one has been operating its plant year after year at handsome profit, many of them against keen competition from the private companies, and none of them operating at a loss. The Brownsville plant, a city of 22,021, operating against keen competition the past 10 years, has shown a net profit of $1,582,020. The Bryan plant, population 7,814, last year showed a net profit of $73,565. The Georgetown plant, population 3,583, last year showed a net profit of $13,640. The Greenville plant, population 12,407, last year showed a net profit of $37,168. The Lubbock plant, population 25,220, last year showed a profit of $88,665. The Vernon plant, population 9,137, last year showed a net profit of $20,872. The Denton plant, population 9,587, last year showed a net profit of $73,397.08. The city of Austin, population 53,120, in 1933 showed the following operating statement for their municipal light plant:

Austin, Tex., municipal electric utility

1. OPERATING STATEMENT, 1933

Operating revenue		$853,776
Operating expenses, excluding depreciation		252,125
Net operating revenue		601,651
Depreciation	$168,200
Taxes	58,752
		226,952
Net operating income		374,699
Nonoperating income		6,780
Gross income		381,479
Interest paid		25,321
Net income		356,158

In addition to the taxes and cash transfers to the city, the plant lighted the streets and municipal buildings without charge to the city.

The Austin plant has also been a self-financing project, in that all costs of original construction and subsequent expansion have been financed from plant revenues.

You will note from the above statement that the city of Austin, of similar size to Wichita Falls, made a net profit of $356,158, after all operating expenses, depreciation, allowances for taxes—$58,752, which is nearly $20,000 more than paid by the private company to the city of Wichita Falls, plus interest—still leaving a net income for the municipal light plant of $356,158; and this net income, as I understand, has been increased in 1934 and 1935.

Let us compare the rates for the city of Austin with those of Wichita Falls:

	Minimum bill	Kilowatt-hours included	Kilowatt-hours
			15	25	40	100	150	250	500
Wichita Falls	$1.00	10	$1.35	$1.85	$2.60	$5.40	$6.90	$9.40	$14.40
Austin	.50	6	1.12	1.87	3.00	4.40	5.40	7.40	11.30

These municipal light plant cities, while giving the citizens the benefit of much lower rates than received by citizens of cities of similar size served by private power companies, as shown by their operating records, have created large surpluses, as above indicated, these surpluses are used to make needed city improvements or to reduce the city tax rates; for example, the city of Vernon had a much lower rate than Wichita Falls and shows a profit of $20,000, and makes no charge for street lighting, parks, football and baseball grounds, municipal buildings, and library. They give annually about 125,000 kilowatts per day to charity. Practically all mercantile establishments, filling stations, and so forth, using display window lights and signs, are furnished lights on a flat charge per month not to exceed 1 cent per kilowatt for this service. The Denton municipal light plant, constructed without cost to the citizens, has paid for itself and has built for the city a plant for which they have been offered over $1,000,000.

In addition to enjoying lower utility rates than charged by cities of similar size by private companies they have reduced their city- and school-tax rates from $2.09 to $1.75. They have the best lighted streets of any city of its size in Texas without cost. These services alone would cost the city $40,000 per year, the price charged by similar private companies for similar services. There is no sewerage charge in Denton.

SOME THINGS TO THINK ABOUT

Municipal light plants for many years throughout the Nation have proved highly successful, and great money makers for cities owning their own light plants. Because of controlled legislation, State and National, adequate regulation of rates has been impossible. The facts stand out that the private power companies because of the inability of the legislatures to enact legislation for the protection of the people, the people are being forced to pay from two to four times as much as should be paid for services rendered. The only way any city can break through this natural monopoly and have reasonable assurance of securing reasonable power rates is to build its own municipal light plant. After the plant is constructed, the records of the municipal light plant operations, Nation-wide, clearly show that they easily pay for themselves and pay their cities a good profit, while at the same time rendering dependable service at much lower rates than charged by private companies.

The Tennessee Valley Authority has now been operating 18 months, and has entered into contracts with seven small cities to sell them current which on the average cost these cities in the neighborhood of 6½ mills for the power consumed, and these little cities have transmitted and sold this power to their citizens for a little less than 2 cents per kilowatt-hour. The basic rates for residential and farm use in T. V. A. contracts are as follows:

Three cents per kilowatt-hour for the first 50 kilowatt-hours per month.

Two cents per kilowatt-hour for the next 150 kilowatt-hours per month.

One cent per kilowatt-hour for the next 200 kilowatt-hours per month.

Four mills per kilowatt-hour for the next 1,000 kilowatt-hours per month.

Seven and one-half mills per kilowatt-hour for all over 1,400 kilowatt-hours per month.

The financial results of the electric operations under T. V. A. rates for these seven cities are as follows:

Financial results of electric operations under T. V. A. rates

Contractor	Months of operation to June 30, 1935	Gross operating revenue	Operating expenses	Percent of gross revenue	Net income	Percent of gross revenue

If the private power companies complain that the low rates of T. V. A. are due to water power, then let me refer to the report of the Byllesby Engineering & Management Co., Chicago, Ill., and their testimony as one of the large private utilities of the country, who testified that the cost of producing electricity by steam is now less than producing same by water power.

TAX-FREE TOWNS

Eighty-nine cities, towns, and villages in the United States have no local city taxes because of revenues received from municipally owned utilities. According to the latest information available, these towns and their population are as follows:

1. Altus, Okla	8,439

If these cities can so efficiently operate their municipally owned plants as to take care of the operating expenses of their cities from the revenues resulting therefrom without requiring any city tax rate, why should not Wichita Falls do likewise?

THE WICHITA FALLS LIGHT PLANT

Shortly before the World War the Kell interests at Wichita Falls owned both the light and water plants at Wichita Falls. These two plants were sold to the Texas Power & Light Co. for $750,000. Shortly after this sale the Texas Power & Light sold the water plant to the city of Wichita Falls for $696,000; in addition thereto the city paid $122,000 for Lake Wichita and certain water rights in the lake, making a total of $818,000 paid by the city to the Texas Power & Light Co. for the water department alone, which left the Texas Power & Light Co., or the Texas Electric Service Co., its twin brother—both of them being owned by the Electric Bond & Share Co.—left them the light plant without cost to them, with a profit of $68,000 beside.

COST OF STREET LIGHTS, ETC.

For the past 7 years it has cost the city of Wichita Falls more than $32,000 per year for street lighting, pumping water, sewerage, park and building lights, and so forth. Assuming that they will pay the same amount the next 7 years, it would save the city $189,000—$224,000 less $35,000 leaves $189,000—to vote to accept this proposition, because the Government is only requiring $35,000 to be paid on this plant in the next 7 years.

It is admitted by those who know that the light plant will be more than self-supporting from the beginning of its operation, as shown by careful analysis shown in the application on file, which survey shows that the municipal light plant should have a minimum income the first year of operation of $300,000 on the basis of at least a 25-percent reduction over existing light rates.

THE CITY'S LARGEST TAXPAYER

The Texas Electric Service Co. is now propagandizing the people that they are the city's largest taxpayer. This is a frequent statement made by the Power Trust in trying to defeat municipal ownership. The facts are no public utility pays any taxes. The people pay the taxes in increased rates charged by the utility, and the utility includes its taxes, as it does its high-powered advertising, lawyer, entertainment, and all other kinds of lobby expenses as a part of their expenses upon which they base their exorbitant rates. It is true that when such a utility is taken over by the people the taxes which it pays will no longer go to the government, and in that sense will be lost, but the cost of producing the service, eliminating all above-mentioned, unnecessary charges will be that much reduced and the people will receive the total amount of taxes paid in lower costs of their public-utility service. There is no excuse for power costing less than 1 cent per kilowatt to generate being sold to the public for from 5 cents to 10 cents per kilowatt. For instance, take the municipal light plant at Austin, Tex. This plant year after year has earned a net income for the city of more than $300,000 per year. The plant is valued at four and one-quarter million dollars, with no outstanding indebtedness. The plant has been in operation 30 years. The total savings to the consumers of electricity in Austin covering that period of time is conservatively estimated to be four and one-half million dollars, which is more than 20 times the amount of taxes which it would have paid as a privately owned plant.

Again, take the last statement rendered—1933—by the Texas Electric Service Co., as required by 1121 R. C. S. of Texas. It shows the total property valuation for rate-making purposes $3,491,442, and for taxpaying purposes their property was rendered at $1,157,690, paying $16,207.66 for city taxes. This same discrepancy will be found almost everywhere by utilities in rendering their property for taxation as compared in computing same for rate-making purposes.

PAY ROLL

Much propaganda has been spread about the large pay roll existing in the Texas Electric Service Co.'s office at Wichita Falls. According to the last annual report filed by the power company in the city clerk's office, in January 1934, the amount paid for salaries, labor, and so forth, was $166,407.82. Compare that sum with the salaries paid for the municipal light plant of the city of Austin, which is $252,125. The history of municipal light plant operation shows that they pay from 20 to 30 percent better wages than are paid under private ownership.

As to the number of employees to be furnished work on this project, the application on file says:

> It is estimated that 200 men will be employed for a period of 18 months on the construction of the electric system. Of this number 80 would be skilled or semiskilled workmen, or workmen classed at higher wages than common labor, and 120 would be common laborers. Of the 80 receiving higher wages than common labor, 20 percent, or 16, would be recruited from the relief rolls. These would include truck drivers, concrete workers, subforemen, and assistants to carpenters, bricklayers, and electric linemen. Of the 120 common laborers, 80 percent, or 96, would be recruited from relief rolls.
> Of the estimated 200 men to be employed, 88 would not be from the relief rolls; however, three-fourths, or 66, would be residents of Wichita Falls and the immediate vicinity.

The permanent staff of employees for the municipal plant will compare favorably with the private plant, and they will receive a living wage.

THE NEGRO IN THE WOOD PILE

The trouble the citizens at Wichita Falls are having seems to be the same trouble we are having Nation-wide. The American Liberty Leaguers, Manufacturers' Association, the United States Chamber of Commerce, and so forth, are trying to dictate, as they always have, the policy of government for their own particular benefit. The citizens of Wichita Falls in the April election of 1935 elected a complete set of city councilmen pledged to fight for the rights of the common people, and, among other things, they pledged the people to try to readjust the tax burden and, in truth and in fact, make it as really equal and uniform as possible, as provided in the Constitution, article I, section 8, which provides:

> Taxation shall be equal and uniform.

The Wichita Falls City Council last year found taxes for 1934 rendered as follows:

For the year 1934:
Real estate	$17,423,940
Personal	8,379,260
Total valuation	25,803,200

An equalization board was appointed, who, after carefully going over the roll, certified the same as follows:

Real estate	$14,952,180
Personal	14,902,000
Total	29,854,180

Among the changes made on some of the principal property holders in the city are the following:

Name	Classification	Rendered	Equalization board value
Brannon, R.	Personal	None	$75,000
City National Bank in Wichita Falls	Real and personal	$228,800	302,900

The city council further, in carrying out their campaign pledges, filed applications with the Federal Government for P. W. A. loans and grants to build a municipal light and gas plant and to make improvements for the city water system. When the self-appointed former leaders of the city could not force the city council to back down on the above-mentioned program upon which they were elected, they began a campaign of destruction, vilification, and abuse to discredit and destroy them in any and every way possible.

For example, the Times Publishing Co. claims their rendition entirely too high and they really turned the heat on the council. Their largest stockholder, Newspapers, Inc., a holding company of Waco, Tex., claims their Times Publishing Co. stock is worth $209 per share—and it probably is, based on recent earnings of more than $10 per share. On this basis the 8,000 shares of stock of the Times Publishing Co. is worth $1,672,000; so it seems that the Times Publishing Co. should not complain upon having their tax valuation increased from $22,750 to $392,000; for, in truth and in fact, their plant, based on recent earnings of their stock, is worth $1,672,000.

THE SO-CALLED TAXPAYERS' COMMITTEE

The Power Trust, through their paid hirelings, brought in from New York, California, and Fort Worth, who have maintained expensive headquarters in the Kemp Hotel and offices in the Staley Building, are already carefully organized, no doubt, to conduct a similar campaign to that which was conducted during the previous campaign last November and December. They have an unlimited expense account from the power company, and whatever sums they spend it is known will be charged as a part of the operating expense of the Texas Electric Service Co. and paid for by the citizens of Wichita Falls in exorbitant light rates. They have already hired their streetwalkers and telephone workers, and, no doubt, the so-called taxpayers' committee, as well as as many as possible of their preferred-stock holders are organized to fight in every way possible the municipal light plant project.

The Texas Electric Service Co.'s slick stock salesmen have bragged that they sold more stock in Wichita Falls than in any other city its size in the United States. These stock-selling schemes are carried on Nation-wide by the power companies to help bribe public opinion so that they may continue to charge unreasonable light rates for the services rendered, primarily for the benefit of the holding company, the Electric Bond & Share Co., of New York. It may be of interest for the poor stockholders to know that according to information available in 1932 the Texas Electric Service Co. made a net profit of about $1,740,000, and of this amount sent about $1,350,000 to the Electric Bond & Share Co. and its intermediate holding companies for so-called useless contractional services rendered. Thus the poor preferred-stock holders, the real owners of the operating company, received less than $300,000.

It must be remembered that the Electric Bond & Share Co. owns 5,998,000 shares of the 6,000,000 common stock of Texas Electric Service Co., which stock is all that participates in the profits. The preferred stock and bonds merely receive 5-percent or 6-percent interest if the company, after the above-outlined milking process is finished, makes that much.

The Texas Electric Service Co. was purchased about 13 years ago by the American Power & Light Co., which is owned by the Electric Bond & Share Co., for less than $3,000,000, and the Texas Electric Service Co. is now valued at over $68,000,000. The American Power & Light Co., one of the holding companies under Electric Bond & Share Co., also owns the Texas Power & Light Co. This property was purchased about 13 years ago by the Southwestern Utilities Co. for less than $4,000,000, and both of these properties were purchased from the Southwestern Utilities Corporation, thus both of these properties cost the Electric Bond & Share less than $7,000,000, and the Texas Electric Service Co. and the Texas Power & Light Co. are now valued and the people paying rates based on a valuation of more than $150,000,000.

THE POWER TRUST "WRITE UP" AND "SHAKE DOWN"

On July 13, 1932, Senator GEORGE NORRIS, of Nebraska, gave a summary of the total write-ups or inflations which had been disclosed to that time, showing findings of the Federal Trade Commission, which showed a grand total write-up or shake-down by the Power Trust of the American people of $925,985,795.26, of which sum we find the write-up and shake-down of the Electric Bond & Share Co., $399,201,827.39. (See vols. 23 and 24 of the Federal Trade Commission report for complete information on the "gold dust twins" of Texas.)

No doubt the so-called taxpayers' committee that functions so well for its master will come forward with all possible misguided preferred stockholders of the Power Trust and urge the people of Wichita Falls to vote to continue the high electric rates now in force.

I have received from the city tax collector of Wichita Falls the following statements of the other so-called taxpayers' committee and other apparently faithful representatives of the Texas Electric Service Co. which should throw some light on the real interest they may now have in protecting this company:

WICHITA FALLS, TEX., December 6, 1935.

I, W. S. Starnes, city tax collector, hereby certify that Shields Heyser is delinquent in city taxes on various pieces of real property for the years 1930 to 1934, inclusive, according to the records in the city tax office.

W. S. STARNES.

WICHITA FALLS, TEX., December 6, 1935.

I, W. S. Starnes, city tax collector, hereby certify that A. W. King rendered no property of any kind or character to the city of Wichita Falls for the year 1935.

W. S. STARNES.

WICHITA FALLS, TEX., December 6, 1935.

I, W. S. Barnes, city tax collector, hereby certify that J. L. Jackson, Jr., rendered lot 6, block 23, Southerland addition to Wichita Falls, with a total tax of $18.76, which he is exempt under homestead ordinance no. 1167, and further that he rendered $400 worth of personal property and taxable value of which is $5.60 for the year 1935.

W. S. STARNES.

WICHITA FALLS, TEX., December 6, 1935.

I, W. S. Starnes, city tax collector, hereby certify that M. D. Walker rendered no property of any kind or character to the city of Wichita Falls for the year 1935.

W. S. STARNES.

WICHITA FALLS, TEX., December 6, 1935.

I, W. S. Starnes, city tax collector, hereby certify that B. D. Sartin rendered no property of any kind or character to the city of Wichita Falls for the year 1935.

W. S. STARNES, Tax Collector.

DISREGARD LAST-MINUTE STATEMENTS

The day before the last election the so-called taxpayers' committee, in attempting to mislead the people, allowed their name to be used to an ad in the Power Trust Dailies entitled "Debunking Tax Free Town Talk", which ad states:

• • • Here are some taxless-town examples: Colby, Kans., and Ponca City, Okla., are claimed "taxless." In Colby nearly 500 pieces of real estate were advertised for sale for delinquent taxes. The same has been true several times in Ponca City.

I wired the mayor of Colby, Kans., as follows:

Please wire me collect whether or not your municipal light plant pays the entire costs of city government. Also whether or not 500 pieces of real estate advertised for sale delinquent city taxes.

To which he replied:

Revenue from our plant pays entire cost city government. No city tax levied. No property being advertised for sale for delinquent city taxes. May be some being sold for nonpayment special improvement county or State tax.

E. F. BECKNER, Mayor, Colby, Kans.

I also wired the superintendent of the municipal light plant, Ponca City, Okla., to which he replied:

Our city is tax-free through the operation of our municipal light plant. No tax for city purposes of any nature being assessed. Our utilities pay all city taxes regardless of nature. Net profit earned annually from light department, $160,000.

PAT SCHLESINGER,
Superintendent, Light Department.

Thus you see how the tools of the Power Trust are ever willing to intentionally misrepresent the facts, when they know it is too late to get this information to the public, in order to win an election for the Power Trust. I feel sure the so-called taxpayers' committee had no knowledge on the two towns above mentioned. No doubt the information was furnished by the Power Trust, who have been proved to resort time and again to any and all means to win a point in order to continue their program of robbery.

The citizens of Wichita Falls may expect the so-called taxpayers' committee and the Judases on the city council, who have betrayed the people and are now supporting the Power Trust and their friends, to bring forward any and all kinds of last-minute arguments trying to deceive the people on the issues involved in the election February 8.

MANY ARE CALLED BUT FEW RESPOND

Mr. O'Neal, Mr. Woodruff, Mr. Backus, Mr. Gossett, and Mr. Sartin were all invited by Mr. Mack Taylor, chairman of the light-plant committee, to speak on behalf of the municipal light plant during the election held December 11. Each and all of these candidates failed and refused to help, and I understand they have maintained that attitude in this election. The Power Trust must be obeyed.

CONCLUSIONS

Bear in mind these facts: The Federal Government, having faith in Wichita Falls, has agreed to loan you $1,260,000 at 4 percent and an outright grant of $490,000 with which to build a municipal light plant. In return the Government takes a mortgage on the plant only and out of the plant's earnings alone asks repayment, it being distinctly understood that in no event shall taxes of any kind ever be levied against the citizens of Wichita Falls to pay any of this indebtedness.

The Government only requires that $35,000 be paid from the revenues of the plant the next 7 years. The city now pays more than that amount annually to the Texas Electric Service Co. for pumping the city's water, sewage, light, and so forth. The history of municipal light plant operation Nation-wide shows that it costs less than 1 cent per kilowatt-hour to generate and distribute the electric current; whatever is charged beyond that will go to retiring the indebtedness of the plant and then toward retiring the indebtedness of the city.

Since Texas has no adequate regulatory commission and little prospects of securing one, the only way the citizens of Wichita Falls can hope to secure lower electric-light rates is to vote for this bond election February 8 and build their own light plant.

The Texas Electric Service Co. is now collecting and taking out of the city of Wichita Falls more than $1,000,000 annually on excessive rates charged, most of which go to New York never to return, and the 1933 statement on file in the city clerk's office shows their cost for power delivered from the central system—1933—was $87,910.18.

If you want to increase employment in Wichita Falls and keep Wichita Falls' money at home to help build Wichita Falls, then each and every citizen of Wichita Falls should appoint himself a committee of one to get out and help win this bond election to insure lower electric-light rates for the future, and then the city will have this additional incentive to offer any prospective business that desires to locate there—the lowest light rate of any city its size in Texas rather than the highest rates.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Washington rise?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, the unanimous-consent request that was asked by me a moment ago and objected to was that I may be permitted to make a few brief remarks and have the clerk read a letter I sent to Dr. Townsend, and I renew the request at this time.

Mr. DUFFEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I object.

WAGE EARNERS AND THE NEW DEAL

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me on Saturday, December 23, 1935:

I want to speak this evening to the American wage earners, laborers, farmers, clerks, and all those of small incomes, and present political and economic facts to them in order that they may decide for themselves what is for their own best interests and that of their families and their country.

I believe it is a waste of time to speak to business or professional men, for if they are not already back in the Republican Party they need their heads examined.

The American wage earner is interested primarily in knowing which party can restore business confidence and provide a steady and permanent job for him at an American standard of wages and of living in order that he may properly support his family—feed, clothe, and house them adequately and give them the opportunities in life to which American people are entitled. Confidence and employment are one and inseparable. The Republican Party, to win, must prove that through sound American principles of government it can restore business confidence, start the factory wheels turning, and put labor to work.

According to the American Federation of Labor, there are eleven and one-half million unemployed this evening, which is more than in July 1933, in spite of the expenditure of $15,000,000,000 in the last 2½ years. This alone is proof of the failure and break-down of the New Deal. The facts are gradually seeping through the mass barrage of propaganda emanating from hundreds of publicity agents paid out of the Treasury of the United States to defend the New Deal. Even the honey-worded and sugar-coated phrases of the President in his fireside chats are unable to befog the issues any longer or cover up the facts. The American Federation of Labor goes on to say that there are 50 percent more unemployed in the United States than in England, Germany, France, and Italy combined with a much greater population. What is wrong? Why has recovery been retarded and the depression prolonged in a country with the greatest natural resources and wealth in the world and with the most loyal, efficient, and industrious labor? Why do we still have 11,500,000 unemployed and 22,000,000 on relief?

The answer is clear and irrefutable—because President Roosevelt has repudiated practically all the sound planks of the party platform upon which he was elected and, likewise, the very principles of the Democratic Party. The people elected Franklin D. Roosevelt by an overwhelming vote in 1932 because in a depression they always seek a change. That is natural and is simply political history repeating itself. No man has had a greater opportunity than did President Roosevelt at the beginning of his term of office, and for the first 4 months he gave an admirable administration, trying to put into effect the sound planks of his platform, practicing economy, balancing the Budget, and thereby restoring confidence and putting people to work. At the end of May 1933 probably 80 percent of the American people regarded President Roosevelt as being almost divinely sent to lead us out of the economic wilderness. Then, almost overnight, he did an about-face, trampled in the mud his promises and pledges to the American people, and called to Washington a host of young radicals, Socialists, and near-Communists never before affiliated or identified with the Democratic Party.

The President put these visionaries and inexperienced theorists to work to formulate and jam through a supine and rubber-stamp Congress a whole series of unsound, unworkable, un-American, unconstitutional socialistic experiments that have all but destroyed business confidence, retarded recovery, consumed our resources, and increased unemployment. Business was placed in a straightjacket, scarcely able to breathe or move in any direction. Uncertainty, fear, dread, and almost a state of terror existed as a result of a government by Executive orders, edicts, governmental agencies, and bureaucracies. The legislative and constitutional powers of Congress were usurped with impunity by the President, including the control of the purse strings, the making of tariff schedules, the valuation of money, and the actual control of industry, banking, and agriculture, leaving Congress without any more legislative clothing than Ghandi. This actually amounts to a change in our representative and constitutional form of government without the consent of the governed.

Hitherto we have had three separate and independent branches of government—the executive, the legislative, and the judicial. The President has usurped the legislative functions, undermined the sovereignty of the States, and has sneered at the judicial branch when it acted in accordance with its functions under the Constitution. Every historian or writer on government points out that whenever the legislative and executive powers are combined it results in tyranny. A rose by another name smells as sweet. A dictatorship, likewise, by another name smells as rotten.

The improvement in business conditions dates from the time the Supreme Court held the N. R. A. unconstitutional. This decision lifted the fear, dread, and almost state of terror of Government control and economic dictatorship off the minds of American businessmen and partially restored confidence throughout the country in spite of the unsound and socialistic New Deal measures that have hampered and harassed business, consumed our resources, increased unemployment, and prolonged the depression.

The Republican National Committee showed good sense in appealing to deceived, disgusted, and misrepresented Jeffersonian Democrats to cross over to help elect a Republican President in defense of their party principles. The "brain trust" have trampled Democratic principles in the mud and have taken the New Deal administration as far away from Jeffersonian principles as they possibly could into crushing bureaucracy, regimentation, collectivism, and State socialism. The Republican Party has always stood for a centralized government, but the "brain trusters" have gone far beyond any previously conceived ideas of a centralized government and established State socialism in the United States.

The American wage earners are primarily interested in permanent jobs, and these can only be assured by sound American principles and the election of a Republican President, which will in itself restore confidence. The workingman is vitally interested in maintaining the American standard of wages and of living under the American protective principle which has made for the wealth and prosperity of the country in the past. This established protective system is rapidly being undermined and destroyed by the free-trade program of Secretary of State Cordell Hull and the unconditional most-favored-nation clause in his reciprocal treaties, bringing American labor into direct competition with labor paid 20 cents a day in Japan or $3 a week in the mines of Hungary. Secretary Hull, a most estimable gentleman, with whom I served in Congress for many years, has a free-trade obsession; and even the Democratic Party discarded free trade many years ago. By the time his long-distance economic policies are put into effect American mills will be closed down and millions of industrious Americans will be driven out to join the army of the unemployed.

The American wage earner is seriously concerned with the high cost of living and with the skyrocketing of prices for meat, pork, potatoes, and bread—the very necessities of life. The housewife, the wage earner's wife, can no longer buy meat and pork and balance her family budget. The processing taxes placed by the New Deal on clothing and foodstuffs are nothing but tariffs within the 48 States, where free trade has hitherto existed, levied on 125,000,000 American consumers. The tariff against goods imported from foreign lands is to protect American labor against the pauperized labor of Europe and Asia, and not against our own labor and consumers as is done by the New Deal processing taxes.

The farmer in the North and East receives few benefits and many increased burdens from the A. A. A. program. I do not blame the western and southern farmers for taking bounties and hand-outs from the Government for destruction of crops and birth control of pigs. But every cotton and wheat farmer must know that these temporary benefits cannot last forever, and that we have already lost half of our cotton export trade and all of our foreign wheat market. The South is committing economic suicide for temporary profit. A million people in the South—sharecroppers, tenant farmers, those who plant, pick, gin, compress, transport, and ship—have lost their jobs due to the A. A. A. program of restriction and are now on the relief rolls, along with another million in the wheat-corn-hog section of the country. Think of the United States—formerly the greatest wheat exporting nation—importing 34,000,000 bushels of wheat to December 1, and exporting less than a million. In addition we imported 41,000,000 bushels of corn, 22,000,000 pounds of butter, 10,000,000 bushels each of oats and rye, 105,000,000 pounds of meat products, 46,000,000 pounds of cheese, and 65,000,000 pounds of tomatoes in the last 11 months in a nation once the granary of the world.

The Republican Party will have a sound and workable agricultural program for the benefit of the American farmers which will restore the foreign markets for our exportable farm surplus and protect our own domestic markets for the American farmer.

All wage earners and farmers are vitally interested in the problem of rapidly mounting taxes, as it means a lower standard of wages and living for them and impoverishment of the so-called middle class. Who will have to pay for the squander mania and the $15,000,000,000 deficit piled up by the New Deal? Why, the wage earners, small businessmen, farmers, and people of moderate and small incomes, through increased consumer's and income taxes and probably a Federal sales tax will be imposed out of necessity. I quote without comment, as none is necessary, from an able speech by Franklin D. Roosevelt, made at Pittsburgh, Pa., October 19, 1932, when he was a candidate for President:

"Taxes are paid in the sweat of every man who labors, because they are a burden on production and can be paid only by production. If excessive, they are reflected in idle factories, tax-sold farms, and hence in hordes of the hungry tramping the streets and seeking jobs in vain. Our workers may never see a tax bill, but they pay in deductions from wages, in increased cost of what they buy. * * * There is not an unemployed man—there is not a struggling farmer—whose interest in this subject is not direct and vital. * * * If, like a spendthrift, the Government throws discretion to the winds, is willing to make no sacrifice at all in spending, extends its taxing to the limit of the people's power to pay, and continues to pile up deficits, it is on the road to bankruptcy."

The American people listening in on the President's Atlanta speech were almost lulled to sleep in a cradle of debt. The President is no longer afraid of the big, bad wolf—of debts, deficits, taxes, or unbalanced budgets. Perhaps the change in the President's viewpoint may be attributed to the desire to continue the hand-outs of all kinds to help keep the New Deal administration in power for another 4 years, in which case the words of Louis XIV—"after me the deluge"—have a significant meaning at this time.

I have only discussed a few problems affecting the pocketbooks of the wage earners, the farmers, and the people of small means. I propose to use the remainder of my time to present my views as to what the Republican Party should do in 1936 in order to win.

I am in favor of the nomination of Senator WILLIAM E. BORAH for President on the Republican ticket, because he can win easily and carry with him a Republican House of Representatives and restore the Republican Party to power in the Western and Eastern States. He is a liberal and wears no collar of any special interest. He has devoted his life to obtaining a square deal for all the American people. Every liberal Republican should be for him and most of the conservatives, because he stands firmly for constitutional and representative government as against economic and political dictatorship.

I predict that most of the Republican candidates for the United States Senate and for Congress who will be up for election in 1936 will be for his nomination, in order to help get elected themselves, if for no other reason.

Let me conclude by admonishing Republicans in all the States of the Union not to be deceived by the carefully planned propaganda of some of the Old Guard reactionary politicians who seek to send uninstructed delegates to the Cleveland convention for so-called trading purposes. I propose at every opportunity to point out the folly of selecting favorite sons and to expose the dangers resulting from such a policy. It merely plays into the hands of a few political manipulators who will select a candidate satisfactory to themselves in a back room, which will mean the doom of the candidate and the party. Political conditions in 1936 will be far different from 1920, 1924, and 1928, when any Republican reactionary, conservative, liberal, or radical could have been elected.

Unfortunately, some of the Old Guard leaders of the Republican Party are hopelessly reactionary and blind to the conditions ahead and will attempt to revive the dead past, which spells ruin for the country and will eventuate in a disastrous radical reaction. Let us follow the advice of that great and courageous American, Theodore Roosevelt, who said: "I propose to do everything I can to make the Republican Party stand for sane and constructive liberalism, just as it was under Lincoln."

The policy of the Republican Party should clearly be neither to compromise with the socialism of the New Deal or to go back to the old order of alleged domination by special interests, wealth, and reaction, but to go forward on a sound and sane liberal platform of a square deal for labor, the farmer, the businessmen, the consumers, and for private property within the confines and compass of the Constitution of the United States.

I take this opportunity to ask all New York State Republicans who are interested in electing delegates in the April primaries favorable to the nomination of Senator BORAH or a liberal candidate for President to communicate with me at the House of Representatives at Washington, as I have been authorized by him to organize the entire State for that specific purpose.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a brief statement to the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, some inquiry, I think, was made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] with reference to the program for the next few days of the Congress.

It is our hope we will not have any session of the House tomorrow, but responsible authorities here in the House are very anxious to proceed as soon as possible to the expedition of our business, and it has been arranged that on Monday

we will take up the Consent Calendar, after the Budget message has been disposed of; and on Tuesday next it is our expectation to take up for consideration the House Private Calendar.

I give this information so that those gentlemen who are concerned may govern themselves accordingly.

RECESS

I now move, Mr. Speaker, that the House stand in recess subject to the call of the Speaker.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess to meet at the call of the Speaker.

AFTER RECESS

The recess having expired, the House (at 8 o'clock and 46 minutes p. m.) was called to order by the Speaker.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to submit a unanimous-consent request. I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns tonight it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute further with reference to the program for next week. I am authorized by the Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to announce that that committee will be ready on Wednesday next to take up the independent offices appropriation bill.

JOINT MEETING OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE

At 8 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m., the Doorkeeper, Mr. J. J. Sinnott, announced the Vice President of the United States and the Members of the United States Senate.

The Members of the House rose.

The Senate, preceded by the Vice President and by their Secretary and Sergeant at Arms, entered the Chamber.

The Vice President took the chair at the right of the Speaker, and the Members of the Senate took the seats reserved for them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the part of the Senate, the Chair appoints the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] as a committee on the part of the Senate to conduct the President into the Chamber.

The SPEAKER. On behalf of the House, the Chair appoints the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] as a like committee on the part of the House.

At 8:55 o'clock p. m. the Doorkeeper announced the Cabinet of the President of the United States.

The members of the Cabinet of the President entered the Chamber and took the seats reserved for them in front of the Speaker's rostrum.

At 9 o'clock p. m. the President of the United States, escorted by the committee of Senators and Representatives, entered the Hall of the House and stood at the Clerk's desk amidst prolonged applause.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Members of the joint session of Congress, I have the privilege and honor to present to you the President of the United States.

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. President, Mr. Speaker, Members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, we are about to enter upon another year of the responsibility which the electorate of the United States has placed in our hands. Having come thus far, it is fitting that we should pause to survey the ground which we have covered and the path which lies ahead.

On the 4th day of March 1933, on the occasion of taking the oath of office as President of the United States, I addressed the people of our country. Need I recall either the scene or the national circumstances attending the occasion? The crisis of that moment was almost exclusively a national one. In recognition of that fact, so obvious to the millions in the streets and in the homes of America, I devoted by far the greater part of that address to what I called, and the Nation called, critical days within our own borders.

You will remember on that 4th of March 1933 the world picture was an image of substantial peace. International consultation and widespread hope for the bettering of relations between the nations gave to all of us a reasonable expectation that the barriers to mutual confidence, to increased trade, and to the peaceful settlement of disputes could be progressively removed. In fact, my only reference to the field of world policy in that address was in these words: "I would dedicate this Nation to the policy of the good neighbor—the neighbor who resolutely respects himself and, because he does so, respects the rights of others—a neighbor who respects his obligations and respects the sanctity of his agreements in and with a world of neighbors."

In the years that have followed that sentiment has remained the dedication of this Nation. Among the nations of the great Western Hemisphere the policy of the good neighbor has happily prevailed. At no time in the four and a half centuries of modern civilization in the Americas has there existed—in any year, any decade, or any generation in all that time—a greater spirit of mutual understanding, of common helpfulness, and of devotion to the ideals of self-government than exists today in the 21 American Republics and their neighbor, the Dominion of Canada. This policy of the good neighbor among the Americas is no longer a hope—no longer an objective remaining to be accomplished—it is a fact, active, present, pertinent, and effective. In this achievement every American nation takes an understanding part. There is neither war, nor rumor of war, nor desire for war. The inhabitants of this vast area, 250,000,000 strong, spreading more than 8,000 miles from the Arctic to the Antarctic, believe in, and propose to follow, the policy of the good neighbor; and they wish with all their heart that the rest of the world might do likewise.

The rest of the world—ah! there is the rub.

Were I today to deliver an inaugural address to the people of the United States, I could not limit my comments on world affairs to one paragraph. With much regret I should be compelled to devote the greater part to world affairs. Since the summer of that same year of 1933 the temper and the purposes of the rulers of many of the great populations in Europe and Asia have not pointed the way either to peace or to good will among men. Not only have peace and good will among men grown more remote in those areas of the earth during this period, but a point has been reached where the people of the Americas must take cognizance of growing ill will, of marked trends toward aggression, of increasing armaments, of shortening tempers—a situation which has in it many of the elements that lead to the tragedy of general war.

On those other continents many nations, principally the smaller peoples, if left to themselves, would be content with their boundaries and willing to solve within themselves and in cooperation with their neighbors their individual problems, both economic and social. The rulers of those nations, deep in their hearts, follow these peaceful and reasonable aspirations of their peoples. These rulers must remain ever vigilant against the possibility today or tomorrow of invasion or attack by the rulers of other peoples who fail to subscribe to the principles of bettering the human race by peaceful means.

And within those other nations—those which today must bear the primary, definite responsibility for jeopardizing world peace—what hope lies? To say the least, there are grounds for pessimism. It is idle for us or for others to preach that the masses of the people who constitute those nations which are dominated by the twin spirits of autocracy and aggression are out of sympathy with their rulers, that they are allowed no opportunity to express themselves, that they would change things if they could.

That, unfortunately, is not so clear. It might be true that the masses of the people in those nations would change the policies of their governments if they could be allowed full freedom, full access to the processes of democratic government as we understand them. But they do not have that access; lacking it, they follow blindly and fervently the lead of those who seek autocratic power.

Nations seeking expansion, seeking the rectification of injustice springing from former wars, or seeking outlets for trade, for population, or even for their own peaceful contributions to the progress of civilization, fail to demonstrate that patience necessary to attain reasonable and legitimate objectives by peaceful negotiation or by an appeal to the finer instincts of world justice.

They have therefore impatiently reverted to the old belief in the law of the sword or to the fantastic conception that they, and they alone, are chosen to fulfill a mission and that all the others among the billion and a half of human beings in the world must and shall learn from and be subject to them.

I recognize—and you will recognize—that these words which I have chosen with deliberation will not prove popular in any nation that chooses to fit this shoe to its foot. Such sentiments, however, will find sympathy and understanding in those nations where the people themselves are honestly desirous of peace, but must constantly aline themselves on one side or the other in the kaleidoscopic jockeying for position that is characteristic of European and Asiatic relations today. For the peace-loving nations—and there are many of them—find that their very identity depends on their moving and moving again on the chessboard of international politics.

I suggested in the spring of 1933 that 85 or 90 percent of all the people in the world were content with the territorial limits of their respective nations and were willing further to reduce their armed forces if every other nation in the world would agree to do likewise.

That is equally true today, and it is even more true today that world peace and world good will are blocked by only 10 or 15 percent of the world's population. That is why efforts to reduce armies have thus far not only failed but have been met by vastly increased armaments on land and in the air, and that is why even efforts to continue the existing limits on naval armaments into the years to come show such little current success.

But the policy of the United States has been clear and consistent. We have sought with earnestness in every possible way to limit world armaments and to attain the peaceful solution of disputes among all nations.

We have sought by every legitimate means to exert our moral influence against repression, against discrimination, against intolerance and autocracy, and in favor of freedom of expression, equality before the law, religious tolerance, and popular rule.

In the field of commerce we have undertaken to encourage a more reasonable interchange of the world's goods. In the field of international finance we have, so far as we are concerned, put an end to dollar diplomacy, to money grabbing, to speculation for the benefit of the powerful and rich, at the expense of the small and the poor.

As a consistent part of a clear policy, the United States is following a twofold neutrality toward any and all nations which engage in wars that are not of immediate concern to the Americas. First, we decline to encourage the prosecution of war by permitting belligerents to obtain arms, ammunition, or implements of war from the United States; second, we seek to discourage the use by belligerent nations of any and all American products calculated to facilitate the prosecution of a war in quantities over and above our normal exports to them in time of peace.

I trust that these clear objectives thus unequivocally stated will be carried forward by cooperation between this Congress and the President.

I realize that I have emphasized to you the gravity of the situation which confronts the people of the world. This emphasis is justified because of its importance to civilization and therefore to the United States. Peace is jeopardized by the few and not by the many. Peace is threatened by those who seek selfish power. The world has witnessed similar eras—as in the days when petty kings and feudal barons were changing the map of Europe every fortnight, or when great emperors and great kings were engaged in a mad scramble for colonial empire.

We hope that we are not again at the threshold of such an era. But if face it we must, then the United States and the rest of the Americas can play but one role: through a well-ordered neutrality to do naught to encourage the contest, through adequate defense to save ourselves from embroilment and attack, and through example and all legitimate encouragement and assistance to persuade other nations to return to the days of peace and good will.

The evidence before us clearly proves that autocracy in world affairs endangers peace and that such threats do not spring from those nations devoted to the democratic ideal. If this be true in world affairs, it should have the greatest weight in the determination of domestic policies.

Within democratic nations the chief concern of the people is to prevent the continuation or the rise of autocratic institutions that beget slavery at home and aggression abroad. Within our borders, as in the world at large, popular opinion is at war with a power-seeking minority.

That is no new thing. It was fought out in the Constitutional Convention of 1787. From time to time since then the battle has been continued, under Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson, Theodore Roosevelt, and Woodrow Wilson.

In these later years we have witnessed the domination of Government by financial and industrial groups, numerically small but politically dominant in the 12 years that succeeded the World War. The present group of which I speak is indeed numerically small and, while it exercises a large influence and has much to say in the world of business, it does not, I am confident, speak the true sentiments of the less articulate but more important elements that constitute real American business.

I go back once more. In March 1933 I appealed to the Congress of the United States and to the people in a new effort to restore power to those to whom it rightfully belonged. The response to that appeal resulted in the writing of a new chapter in the history of popular government. You, the Members of the legislative branch, and I, the Executive, contended for and established a new relationship between Government and people.

What were the terms of that new relationship? They were an appeal from the clamor of many private and selfish interests; yes, an appeal from the clamor of partisan interest, to the ideal of the public interest. Government became the representative and the trustee of the public interest. Our aim was to build upon essentially democratic institutions, seeking all the while the adjustment of burdens, the help of the needy, the protection of the weak, the liberation of the exploited, and the genuine protection of the people's property.

It goes without saying that to create such an economic constitutional order more than a single legislative enactment was called for. We had to build, you in the Congress and I, as the Executive, upon a broad base. Now, after 34 months of work, we contemplate a fairly rounded whole. We have returned the control of the Federal Government to the city of Washington.

To be sure, in so doing, we have invited battle. We have earned the hatred of entrenched greed. The very nature of the problem that we faced made it necessary to drive some people from power and strictly to regulate others. I made that plain when I took the oath of office in March 1933. I spoke of the practices of the unscrupulous money changers who stood indicted in the court of public opinion. I spoke of the rulers of the exchanges of mankind's goods, who failed through their own stubbornness and their own incompetence. I said that they had admitted their failure and had abdicated.

Abdicated? Yes, in 1933; but now with the passing of danger they forget their damaging admissions and withdraw their abdication.

They offer, they seek—let us put it that way—the restoration of their selfish power. They offer to lead us back round the same old corner into the same old dreary street.

Yet there are still determined groups that are intent upon that very thing. Rigorously held up to popular examination, their true character presents itself. They steal the livery of great national constitutional ideals to serve discredited special interests. As guardians and trustees for great groups of individual stockholders, they wrongfully seek to carry the property and the interests entrusted to them into the arena of partisan politics. They seek—this minority in business and industry—to control and often do control and use for their own purposes legitimate and highly honored business associations; they engage in vast propaganda to spread fear and discord among the people—they would "gang up" against the people's liberties.

The principle that they would instill into government if they succeed in seizing power is well shown by the principles which many of them have instilled into their own affairs: autocracy toward labor, toward stockholders, toward consumers, toward sentiment. Autocrats in smaller things, they seek autocracy in bigger things. "By their fruits ye shall know them."

If these gentlemen believe, as they say they believe, that the measures adopted by this Congress and its predecessor, and carried out by this administration, have hindered rather than promoted recovery, let them be consistent. Let them propose to this Congress the complete repeal of these measures. The way is open to such a proposal.

In other words, let action be positive and not negative. The way is open in the Congress of the United States for an expression of opinion by yeas and nays. Shall we say that values are restored and that the Congress will, therefore, repeal the laws under which we have been bringing them back? Shall we say that because national income has grown with rising prosperity we shall repeal existing taxes and thereby put off the day of approaching a balanced Budget and of starting to reduce the national debt? Shall we abandon the reasonable support and regulation of banking? Shall we restore the dollar to its former gold content? Shall we say to the farmer, "The prices for your products are, in part, restored, now go and hoe your own row"? Shall we say to the home owners, "We have reduced your rates of interest, we have no further concern with how you keep your home or what you pay for your money; that is your affair"? Shall we say to the several millions of unemployed citizens who face the very problem of existence—yes; of getting enough to eat—"We will withdraw from giving you work; we will turn you back to the charity of your communities and to those men of selfish power who tell you that perhaps they will employ you if the Government leaves them strictly alone"? Shall we say to the needy unemployed, "Your problem is a local one, except that perhaps the Federal Government, as an act of mere generosity, will be willing to pay to your city or to your county a few grudging dollars to help maintain your soup kitchens"? Shall we say to the children who have worked all day in the factory, "Child labor is a local issue and so are your starvation wages; something to be solved or left unsolved by the jurisdictions of 48 States"? Shall we say to the laborer, "Your right to organize, your relations with your employer have nothing to do with the public interest; if your employer will not even meet with you to discuss your problems and his, that is none of our affair"? Shall we say to the unemployed and the aged, "Social security lies not within the province of the Federal Government; you must seek relief elsewhere"? Shall we say to the men and women who live in conditions of squalor in country and in city, "The health and the happiness of you and your children are no concern of ours"? Shall we expose our population once more by the repeal of laws to protect them against the loss of their honest investments and against the manipulations of dishonest speculators? Shall we abandon the splendid efforts of the Federal Government to raise the health standards of the Nation and to give youth a decent opportunity through such means as the Civilian Conservation Corps?

Members of the Congress, let these challenges be met. If this is what these gentlemen want, let them say so to the Congress of the United States. Let them no longer hide their dissent in a cowardly cloak of generality. Let them define the issue. We have been specific in our affirmative action. Let them be specific in their negative attack.

But the challenge faced by this Congress is more menacing than merely a return to the past—bad as that would be. Our resplendent economic autocracy does not want to return to that individualism of which they prate, even though the advantages under that system went to the ruthless and the strong. They realize that in 34 months we have built up new instruments of public power. In the hands of a people's government this power is wholesome and proper. But in the hands of political puppets of an economic autocracy such power would provide shackles for the liberties of the people. Give them their way and they will take the course of every autocracy of the past—power for themselves, enslavement for the public.

And their weapon is the weapon of fear. I have said: "The only thing we have to fear is fear itself." That is as true today as it was in 1933. But such fear as they instill today is not a natural fear, a normal fear; it is a synthetic, manufactured, poisonous fear that is being spread subtly, expensively, and cleverly by the same people who cried in those other days, "Save us, else we perish."

I am confident that the Congress of the United States well understands the facts and is ready to wage unceasing warfare against those who seek a continuation of that spirit of fear. The carrying out of the laws of the land as enacted by the Congress requires protection until final adjudication by the highest tribunal of the land. The Congress has the right and can find the means to protect its own prerogatives.

We are justified in our present confidence. Restoration of national income, which shows continuing gains for the third successive year, supports the normal and logical policies under which agriculture and industry are returning to full activity. Under these policies we approach a balance of the National Budget. National income increases: tax receipts, based on that income, increase without the levying of new taxes. That is why I am able to say to this, the second session of the Seventy-fourth Congress, that based on existing laws it is my belief that no new taxes, over and above the present taxes, are either advisable or necessary.

National income increases: employment increases. Therefore, we can look forward to a reduction in the number of those citizens who are in need. Therefore, also, we can anticipate a reduction in our appropriations for relief.

In the light of our substantial material progress, in the light of the increasing effectiveness of the restoration of popular rule, I recommend to the Congress that we advance, and that we do not retreat. I have confidence; confidence that you will not fail the people of the Nation whose mandate you have already so faithfully fulfilled.

I repeat, with the same faith and the same determination, my words of March 4, 1933: "We face the arduous days that lie before us in the warm courage of national unity; with a clear consciousness of seeking old and precious moral values; with a clean satisfaction that comes from the stern performance of duty by old and young alike. We aim at the assurance of a rounded and permanent national life. We do not distrust the future of essential democracy."

I cannot better end this message on the state of the Union than by repeating the words of a wise philosopher at whose feet I sat many years ago:

"What great crises teach all men whom the example and counsel of the brave inspire is this lesson: Fear not, view all the tasks of life as sacred, have faith in the triumph of the ideal, give daily all that you have to give, be loyal and rejoice whenever you find yourselves part of a great ideal enterprise. You, at this moment, have the honor to belong to a generation whose lips are touched by fire. You live in a land that now enjoys the blessings of peace. But let nothing human be wholly alien to you. The human race now passes through one of its great crises. New ideas, new issues—a new call for men to carry on the work of righteousness, of charity, of courage, of patience, and of loyalty. * * * However memory brings back this moment to your minds, let it be able to say to you: That was a great moment. It was the beginning of a new era. * * * This world in its crisis called for volunteers, for men of faith in life, of patience in service, of charity, and of insight. I responded to the call however I could. I volunteered to give myself to my Master—the cause of humane and brave living. I studied, I loved, I labored, unsparingly and hopefully, to be worthy of my generation."

Thereupon, at 9 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m., the President retired from the Hall of the House.

At 9 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m., the Vice President announced that the joint session was dissolved.

Thereupon the Vice President and the Members of the Senate returned to their Chamber.

REFERENCE OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the President's message be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Members of the Senate and House of Representatives, I move that the House do now adjourn.

SENATE

MONDAY, JANUARY 6, 1936

The Senate met at 12 m.

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Christ of God, who in the olden time wast revealed to wise men by the guiding of a star: Son of God, made man that we, the sons of men might be the sons of God: Beam on us now with that Light whose smile kindles the universe, with that Beauty in which all things work and move, and with that sustaining love which consumes each cloud of cold mortality.

Grant that we may follow duty's call without one backward look, yielding ourselves, our life, our all, to the service of our country.

Help us to live in deeds, not years; to measure time by thoughts and heartthrobs, that life's eternal splendor may be revealed in us as we become interpreters of God to men. All of which we ask in Thy dear name and for Thy sake. Amen.

WARREN R. AUSTIN, a Senator from the State of Vermont; FRED H. BROWN, a Senator from the State of New Hampshire; TOM CONNALLY, a Senator from the State of Texas; PETER G. GERRY, a Senator from the State of Rhode Island; FREDERICK HALE, a Senator from the State of Maine; DANIEL O. HASTINGS, a Senator from the State of Delaware; and A. SUPPLEMENTAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, when the Congress adjourned sine die there was pending a motion by myself to reconsider the vote by which the third deficiency appropriation bill was passed. I ask now that that motion be agreed to, with a view to having action taken with regard to the bill. I refer to the bill (H. R. 9215) making appropriations to provide urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I assume that the bill will then take its orderly place on the calendar?

Mr. ROBINSON. No. It is my expectation that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, will move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MCNARY. Very well; but the Senator from Arkansas is not now asking for final action on the bill?

Mr. ROBINSON. I am asking for no other action than that I have indicated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas? The Chair hears none, and the motion to reconsider is agreed to.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I move that House bill 9215, the so-called third deficiency appropriation bill, be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations. That is not only desirable but it is practically imperative, as the Budget estimates have been changed in numerous instances.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE SERVICE

Mr. ROBINSON. On behalf of the majority, I submit an order relative to certain committee assignments.

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON, and by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] be assigned to service on the Committee on the Judiciary; and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. BENSON] be assigned to service on the following committees: Claims, Interstate Commerce, Mines and Mining, and Public Lands and Surveys.

BIRTHDAY OF SENATOR DUNCAN U. FLETCHER

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], who has honored the country and his constituency with a prolonged service in this body, has attained today the age of 77 years. Notwithstanding that advanced age, he has borne and is carrying a weighty load of responsibility. He enjoys the respect and admiration of his colleagues. I am happy to have the privilege of congratulating him and the country on his service.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, as a part-time resident of the State of Florida, I regard the senior Senator from that State as one of my Senators. He has in this body the affection and respect of every Member. It may be appropriate for me to make known how deeply beloved he is in the State of Florida. No man in that fair State, which, after New York and Michigan—my birthplace—is the best State in the Union, holds more deeply and strongly the affections of its citizens than does the senior Senator from Florida. I desire to add my felicitations to those which have been offered by our leader.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I find great pleasure in joining in these felicitations to the eminent Senator from Florida. One of the great bards gave utterance to the complete aphorism that "the very acme of all there is in life has been reached when one may have the joy to perceive the fruits of his efforts in a long life, a ripe age, and troops of friends." It is evident from these tributes that the distinguished Senator from Florida enjoys that distinction.

I should particularly like the young men of the country to note the commendation of a man reaching such age, with long public service, for the character and fidelity of his citizenship and service, in order that such demonstration may give to those entering upon public life stimulus and encouragement to emulate his example. We join with Dentatus, the Roman, in the prayer that the gods of war may prolong the life of such a man for future service to mankind, to the blessing of his country.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, since the older Members of the Senate have spoken so well of the great senior Senator from Florida, it behooves me, as representing the younger Members of this body, to add our congratulations and to express our esteem and love for him.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, as one of the humble members of the Committee on Banking and Currency, over which the senior Senator from Florida presides as chairman, I wish merely to add my personal felicitations on this happy occasion of the anniversary of the birth of the Senator from Florida, and also belatedly to felicitate the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], his colleague on the committee, whose birthday preceded by 2 days that of the Senator from Florida.

I dare say no man in this body, or out of it, who is not a member of that committee and who has not worked with the Senator from Florida during the last 3 or 4 years can appreciate the tremendous amount of work which he has done and the very great sacrifice which he has made of his own personal comfort in the service of his country.

No Senator in the last 4 years has worked harder, more assiduously and continuously, and more unselfishly than has the Senator from Florida in his capacity as Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency. I am happy not only to felicitate him on this occasion but to wish him many more returns of the day.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, as the colleague of the senior Senator from Florida I am very happy to congratulate him upon his youth instead of his age. Well known to every Member of the Senate, as well as to the citizens of Florida and the Nation, are his energy, his splendid ability, and his devotion to public duty. I congratulate him and also I congratulate Florida and the Nation. My State and the Nation are very proud of my distinguished colleague.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] has made my speech for me. I concur in everything he said about the distinguished senior Senator from Florida as to his patriotism and measurably as to his judgment.

I believe I am the only Member of the Senate to exceed the Senator from Florida not in point of service but in point of age, and I tell the Senate that because the Senate would not know it without being told. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, on behalf of the older and younger Members of the Senate, and of all the Republican Members, I wish to join the Democratic Members in extending congratulations and felicitations to my good friend the senior Senator from Florida.

I have served with him a number of years on the Committee on Commerce. I have always found him fair, courageous, and courteous; and I can assure him that all the Members of the Republican Party share with the Democrats the high esteem in which he is held.

THE LATE SENATOR HUEY P. LONG

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Joint resolution memorializing the Congress to continue appropriations for eradication of Bang's disease

Whereas the Federal and State program relating to the eradication of Bang's disease has rendered a valuable service to the dairy industry of Wisconsin; and

Whereas it is the sense of this legislature that said program should be continued until the complete elimination of said disease has been accomplished: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That the Wisconsin Legislature respectfully urges the Congress of the United States to continue its appropriations for money for the purpose of the elimination of Bang's disease; and be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, to both Houses of Congress, and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Illinois, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

House Joint Resolution 6

Whereas there is pending in the Congress of the United States a resolution introduced by Congressman FRANK L. KLOEB, of Ohio, providing for the appropriation of $250,000 for the erection of a memorial at Greenville, Ohio, commemorating the signing of the famous Treaty of Greenville and perpetuating the memory of Gen. Anthony Wayne; and

Whereas the signing of this treaty with the Indians on August 3, 1795, through negotiation by Gen. Anthony Wayne, marked the welding of the Northwest Territory and the Thirteen Original Colonies into a continental empire; and

Whereas out of the territory so acquired arose the great State of Illinois; and

Whereas the Treaty of Greenville and the magnificent leadership of General Wayne are highlights in American history which should be preserved in a fitting memorial; and

Whereas the State of Illinois will be invited to prepare such tablets and other mementos as it may desire, for placement the said memorial structure: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Fifty-ninth General Assembly of the State of Illinois at the first special session thereof (the senate concurring herein), That Congress and the President of the United States be memorialized to pass and approve the resolution now pending before the Congress of the United States introduced by Congressman FRANK L. KLOEB, of Ohio, providing for the erection of a memorial at Greenville, Ohio; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President and Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each of the Senators and Congressmen from the State of Illinois.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Ohio, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

Joint resolution relating to the Treaty of Greenville memorial

Whereas Greenville, Ohio, is the site of Fort Greene, where on August 3, 1795, was negotiated the famous treaty between Gen. "Mad Anthony" Wayne and the Indians, signed by President George Washington and William Henry Harrison, aide-de-camp to General Wayne and later President of the United States; and

Whereas that treaty made good the dismaying defeat of General St. Clair at Fort Recovery, and was the fruit of General Wayne's victory at Fallen Timbers, the most complete and the most important victory ever won over the Northwest Indians; and

Whereas the treaty caused the British to retire from Detroit, Michillimackinac, and other lake points, thus putting into final effect the Treaty of Paris, 1783, ending the last throes of the Revolutionary War and welding the Northwest Territory with the Thirteen Colonies into a continental empire, secure from the French, British, and Indian attacks; and

Whereas the treaty saved the national administration from further danger, anxiety, and vituperation and fully justified President Washington's personally conceived and directed plans concerning the conquest of the Northwest; and

Whereas by the treaty the Stars and Stripes automatically changed from a flag of Thirteen Colonies to the flag of the United States, the coming world power; and

Whereas the pledge of security given by the treaty stimulated emigration in the entire territory north of the Ohio River and east of the Mississippi River, making possible the founding of such outstanding cities as Cincinnati, Cleveland, Fort Wayne, Indianapolis, Detroit, Chicago, Milwaukee, Minneapolis, and many other great cities; and

Whereas the five States, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, and also a part of Minnesota, grew out of the conquered Northwest Territory and are therefore equally indebted to and interested in the signing of the treaty, done long before State boundaries were fixed; and

Whereas the hero of the treaty, Gen. Anthony Wayne, has been nowhere in the United States honored as fittingly as he deserves, Greenville being the only logical place for such a purpose; and

Whereas there is now pending in the Congress of the United States House Joint Resolution No. 387, introduced by the Honorable FRANK L. KLOEB, Congressman, Fourth District of Ohio, for the appropriation of $250,000 for the erection of a suitable memorial at Greenville, Ohio, to commemorate the signing of the famous Treaty of Greeneville and to perpetuate the memory of the great Revolutionary general, "Mad Anthony" Wayne, which ended the conquest of the Indian nations and the establishment of peace in the territory now comprised of the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, and part of Minnesota, the Northwest Territory; and

Whereas the hundreds of mementos and trophies of the most critical period of American life and hundreds of relics of the Revolutionary War period picked from the battlefields of the St. Clair, Wayne, and other campaigns, along the famous Revolutionary trail from Fort Washington (Cincinnati) to Detroit, now inadequately housed in the public-library museum at Greenville, and many private Revolutionary War collections should be preserved for this and future generations and exhibited at the center of Wayne's greatest triumph at Greenville, Ohio, in a suitable memorial building: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Ohio in session assembled, That we hereby memorialize and petition the Congress of the United States to pass, and the President of the United States to approve, if passed, the Treaty of Greenville memorial resolution herein referred to; and

Be it further resolved, That the Governor of Ohio be requested to communicate with the Governors of the States of Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota and ask that the legislatures of these several States cooperate with the State of Ohio and respectfully ask their legislatures to pass similar memorial resolutions asking their United States Senators and Representatives in Congress to support the Kloeb resolution, and to invite the said States comprising the Northwest Territory, together with the States of Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Kentucky, which States furnished the most soldiers in the campaign of 1794, to prepare such tablets and other mementos to be placed in such memorial structure as they may desire; and

Be it further resolved, That certified copies of this resolution, properly authenticated, be sent forthwith to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and each of the United States Senators and Representatives from Ohio.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Texas, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 17

Whereas the Forty-third Legislature of the State of Texas in regular session adopted Senate Concurrent Resolution 73, giving the consent of the State that the Federal Government purchase lands in Texas for reforestation and other purposes; and

Whereas pursuant to such consent on the part of the State the United States has purchased and is purchasing large tracts of land, particularly for watershed protection and forest preservation purposes; and

Whereas in the eastern part of the State the tracts have been purchased in such large contiguous areas that in several counties more than 50 percent of the area of said counties is being purchased, thus removing said lands from taxation for State, county, district, and municipal purposes; and

Whereas in some of said counties more than 25 percent of the assessed valuation of property is being thus removed from the tax rolls; and

Whereas in many instances the entire area of school districts and the entire area of road districts is being removed from taxation; and

Whereas the State of Texas has already granted its consent to such program because of the beneficial results which will accrue to the section of the State involved and which will accrue to the State generally; and

Whereas the State likewise is affected by the removal of such large areas from taxation in the following particulars:

(a) In the future the State will not receive from said lands the taxes it has been receiving in the past for State ad valorem, State pension, and State available school purposes;

(b) The State owns in its permanent school funds and in other funds bonds of counties, cities, road districts, and school districts situated within the affected area which cannot be paid according to their tenor and effect because of the removal from taxation of a substantial part of the property originally securing said indebtedness;

(c) The State is interested in the condition of the citizens of said communities upon whom the burden of paying taxes will rest after said lands have been released from taxation, which burdens in the instance of bonds which are supported by unlimited taxing power must be materially increased, and in instances wherein said bonds are supported by limited taxing power must be increased to the maximum; and

Whereas the counties most seriously affected by said condition have heretofore employed counsel to seek some relief at the hands of the Congress of the United States; and

Whereas the State board of education, the Governor, and the attorney general have been cooperating with the counties and their counsel in such undertaking; and

Whereas at the recent session of the Seventy-fourth Congress Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD, of Texas, introduced and supported an amendment to a pending bill (H. R. 6776) which if enacted into law would have permitted the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make refinancing loans to the various governmental agencies in the affected area on a basis which would have prevented a default in the payment of said obligations without increasing the burden of taxation on the taxpayers in said affected area, at the same time assuring to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation the payment of said obligations made to it; and

Whereas said refinancing plan was based on the theory that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation should make such loans available at interest rates sufficiently low that funds could be furnished for refinancing in amounts which would prevent losses to the creditors, and at the same time would not increase the tax burdens, even though a substantial part of the property in the respective communities were removed from taxation; and

Whereas the Sheppard amendment received favorable consideration and support by the board of directors of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, including the approval of the Honorable Jesse H. Jones, of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation; and

Whereas the amendment introduced by Senator SHEPPARD was unanimously approved after hearing by the Banking and Currency Committee of the United States Senate; and

Whereas said bill (H. R. 6776) was thereafter passed finally with said amendment by unanimous vote of the Senate and of the House of Representatives of Congress; and

Whereas said bill was thereafter vetoed by the President of the United States for reasons assigned by him as follows:

"The second provision of this bill extends Government lending into a new field which might be construed to commit the Federal Government to a policy entirely too far reaching—that of lending to counties, districts, or municipalities to enable them to take care of already existing bonded indebtedness."

Whereas the legislature is hopeful that after a reconsideration, the President will conclude that the extension of the lending powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for the proposed purpose will not be unwarranted, taking into consideration the benefits which have accrued from the use of the powers heretofore granted to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, under which loans have been made and are now being made to drainage, levee, and irrigation districts for refinancing their existing indebtedness, and having due consideration for the benefits which likely will accrue to the people from the use of the power granted by the Seventy-fourth Congress to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans to distressed school districts, whereby the existing indebtedness of such districts can now be refinanced through loans made by the Corporation; and

Whereas it is the belief of the legislature that the additional lending power proposed for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation might be justified on the theory that it can be used only in instances wherein the borrowing county or district has been seriously affected by the removal of lands from taxation purchased by the United States; and

Whereas the legislature is hopeful that the President will conclude that if such additional power to be granted to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation constitutes an extension of the policy of the Government lending, taking into consideration the power it is already exercising in reference to drainage, levee, and irrigation districts, and in reference to school districts, in which borrowing agencies the Government has made no purchases of land, that such extension of powers will be considered justified by reason of the fact that the condition necessitating the refinancing operation would not have arisen if the Government had not purchased the lands underlying the indebtedness of such counties and districts; and

Whereas the State of Texas appreciates the cooperation of the Government and the benefits which will accrue from the reforestation program but desires the further cooperation of the Government in relieving the attendant hardships insofar as consistent, and insofar as the act of relieving said hardships will not cause a financial loss to the United States: Be it

Resolved by the senate (and the house of representatives concurring): (1) That the action of the counties seriously affected and the actions of the State board of education, the Governor, and the attorney general in seeking legislation by Congress to relieve said condition are approved;

(2) That the cooperation heretofore rendered by the Senators and by the Congressmen from the State of Texas in reference to said matter is appreciated and is approved;

(3) That the efforts in this behalf made by the Congressmen whose districts are seriously affected, viz, Congressmen NAT. H. PATTON and MARTIN DIES are appreciated and approved;

(4) That the special efforts made in behalf of said legislation by the Honorable MORRIS SHEPPARD, United States Senator from Texas, and by the Honorable Jesse H. Jones, Chairman, Reconstruction Finance Corporation, are appreciated and approved;

(5) That the Senators and Members of the House from the State of Texas in the National Congress are requested to renew and continue their efforts in behalf of said legislation or some other legislation which will accomplish the purpose;

(6) That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, requested to repass the legislation herein described or some similar legislation which will accomplish its purpose;

(7) That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to give careful reconsideration to said subject to the end that, if he can consistently do so, he may cooperate in and approve such legislation;

(8) That the secretary of the senate be, and he is hereby, directed to forward a copy of this resolution to each of the following: The President of the United States, the Secretary of the Senate of the United States, the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each United States Senator and each Congressman from the State of Texas.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Nebraska, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States, the President, the Secretary of State, and all other Federal agencies and instrumentalities concerned vigilantly to enforce and righteously to adhere to the present neutrality policy of the United States of America as set forth in Public Resolution No. 67, Seventy-fourth Congress of the United States

Whereas on August 31, 1935, a public resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries; the prohibition of the transportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war by vessels of the United States for the use of belligerent states; for the registration and licensing of persons engaged in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing arms, ammunition, or implements of war; and restricting travel by American citizens on belligerent ships during war" was adopted and promulgated as a national policy with respect to neutrality toward belligerent countries; and

Whereas it is the sense of this house that the United States of America should not now or at any time become involved in any war which primarily concerns the destiny or the interest of any European country, unless the territory of the United States shall be threatened with invasion: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives in fifty-first (special) session assembled—

1. That this house hereby respectfully commends the President of the United States, the Congress of the United States, and the Secretary of State of the United States for the policy of neutrality adopted, and memorializes them to continue that policy to the end that the United States may not become involved in another world war and to enforce and righteously to adhere to the commitments contained in Public Resolution No. 67, Seventy-fourth Congress of the United States of America.

2. That the chief clerk of this house be hereby ordered and directed forthwith to forward a copy of this resolution, properly authenticated and suitably engrossed to the President of the United States, to the Vice President of the United States, as presiding officer of the United States Senate, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, to the Secretary of State of the United States, and to the United States Senators and Congressmen representing the State of Nebraska in Congress, to the end that public officials in Washington and representatives of the State of Nebraska in Washington may know the position of this house on the question of national neutrality.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the petition of Percy H. O'Brien, Esq., of Los Angeles, Calif., praying for the repeal of the National Bank and Federal Reserve Acts and the enactment of legislation providing for a central bank, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by Sons of Italy, Lodge No. 267, of Willimantic, Conn., favoring the application in equal degree of the neutrality policy of the United States toward both Italy and Ethiopia in their present conflict, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted at Milwaukee, Wis., at the second national convention of Young Democratic Clubs of America, commending the action of Congress in forbidding the sale of contraband material to warring nations and favoring the enactment of legislation making permanent the prohibition of loans to such nations, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate a pledge of support by Ben Benoutz, of Bronx, N. Y., in any action to end war and promote peace among the nations, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Workmen's Sick and Death Benefit Fund of the United States of America, of Brooklyn, N. Y., favoring the enactment of House bill 2827, providing unemployment and social insurance and old-age pensions, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the tenth annual convention of the North American Gasoline Tax Conference protesting against the continuation of the Federal gasoline tax, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Board of Supervisors of the County of Los Angeles, Calif., favoring the restitution of all deductions of established compensation heretofore made in the case of disabled war veterans, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Council of Toledo, Ohio, favoring the immediate payment of the so-called "soldiers' bonus", which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from Mrs. Olivia M. Cutting stating that she does not wish an appropriation of $10,000 to be made to her as the mother of the late Senator Bronson Cutting, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Racine (Wis.) County Board favoring the continuation of the Works Progress Administration after March 31, 1936, to keep employable men off the relief rolls, and to amend the regulations governing such Administration so as to permit employment in so-called border-line cases, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Common Council of Racine, Wis., favoring the amendment of regulations governing the Works Progress Administration so as to permit employment in so-called border-line cases, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the American Prison Association at Atlanta, Ga., favoring the enactment of legislation providing for the trial and disposition of juvenile offenders in courts of special jurisdiction, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Rock River Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of Elgin, Ill., and the Holston Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of Maryville, Tenn., favoring the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting sectarian appropriations, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the International Union of Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers, of Salt Lake City, Utah, favoring the making of an appropriation for the erection of a monument in the form of a home for aged and indigent miners in memory of the pioneer miners of Nevada, which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the executive committee of the Louisiana State Bar Association, New Orleans, La.; the Washoe County Bar Association, of Reno, Nev., and the Los Angeles Bar Association, Los Angeles, Calif., favoring the enactment of legislation providing for the establishment of a trust fund to be known as the Oliver Wendell Holmes Memorial Fund, which were referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also laid before the Senate the petition of the Rantoul Chamber of Commerce, of Rantoul, Ill., praying for the retention of the Air Corps Technical School at Chanute Field, Rantoul, Ill., which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate the memorial of B. N. Kahalepuna, of Honolulu, Hawaii, remonstrating against the granting of statehood to Hawaii, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate petitions of citizens of the United States praying for an investigation of charges filed by the Women's Committee of Louisiana relative to the qualifications of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON], which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Willamette Democratic Society of Oregon, of Willamette, Oreg., favoring the enactment of legislation to prevent corruption in political campaigns and prescribing certain penalties, which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the board of directors of the Associated Printing Industries, of Oakland, Calif., and the Association of Printing Manufacturers, of Topeka, Kans., protesting against printing in the Government Printing Office of all Government forms and publications and favoring participation in such printing by private industry, which were referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Sons of Union Veterans of the Civil War, at Grand Rapids, Mich., favoring the registration of aliens, the deportation of undesirable aliens, and also the enactment of legislation prohibiting the use of all public buildings and tax-supported schools by any group who advocate the overthrow of government by force or violence, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram from Fred L. Teuton, of Port Arthur, Tex., protesting against the confirmation of Stuart Martin as postmaster at Port Arthur, Tex., which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition numerously signed by sundry citizens of Oberlin, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation embodying the so-called Townsend old-age-pension plan, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

ATLANTIC-GULF SHIP CANAL, FLA.

Mr. VANDENBERG submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 210), which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Resolved, That the Senate Commerce Committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is instructed to investigate and report to the Senate as promptly as possible respecting the so-called Atlantic-Gulf waterway, otherwise known as the Florida Ship Canal, with a view to determining the following facts:

1. The nature and extent of expenditures to be made from emergency relief funds and subsequent expenditures for construction and maintenance to be made from regular funds.

2. The sufficiency of plans and information to determine whether the canal should be a sea-level or a lock canal and whether it should be 30 or 35 feet in depth.

3. The sufficiency of authentic information to determine whether the canal will contaminate the ground-water supply of adjacent areas.

4. The nature and extent of available traffic to warrant the ultimate expenditure of between $140,000,000 and $200,000,000 upon the project; be it further

Resolved, That in pursuit of this inquiry, the Senate Commerce Committee is instructed to study and report its conclusions upon the advisability of continuing this project, or starting any other projects, for the establishment of waterways without an enabling act of Congress.

For the purpose of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-fourth and succeeding Congresses, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures, as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic service to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $2,500, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

INVESTIGATION OF LYNCHINGS

Mr. VAN NUYS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 211), which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Whereas during the debate on the motion to consider S. 24, Seventy-fourth Congress, first session (Costigan-Wagner bill), which debate continued from April 26, 1935, to May 1, 1935, without any decision of the merits of that motion or of said bill; and

Whereas statements by various Members of the Senate were made on the Senate floor to the effect that Federal legislation against lynching is unnecessary, as the several States can and will prevent lynchings and punish lynchers, and that local and State officials should not in fact be reasonably deemed responsible, personally or officially, for any mob violation of constitutional guaranties for American citizens; and

Whereas since May 1, 1935, it is credibly recorded that there have been at least 14 lynchings in the United States of both white and Negro citizens in at least seven States, East, West, North, and South: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to investigate (1) the facts and circumstances surrounding the lynchings which have occurred in the United States since May 1, 1935; (2) the relation of such lynchings to other crimes and to the maintenance of law and order; and (3) the action, if any, taken by the responsible public authorities to prevent such lynchings and to punish the persons guilty of committing such crimes. The committee shall report to the Senate as soon as practicable but not later than March 1, 1936, the results of its investigations, together with its recommendations.

For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings; to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Senate in the Seventy-fourth and succeeding Congresses; to employ such clerical and other assistants; to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents; to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $———, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR LONG

Mr. OVERTON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 212), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed by the Vice President in arranging for and attending the funeral of Hon. Huey P. Long, late a Senator from the State of Louisiana, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR SCHALL

Mr. McNARY (for Mr. SHIPSTEAD) submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 213), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed by the Vice President in arranging for and attending the funeral of Hon. Thomas D. Schall, late a Senator from the State of Minnesota, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

REPRESENTATION OF COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON THE COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. COPELAND submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 214), which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That three members of the Committee on Commerce, to be selected by said committee, shall be ex-officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, to serve on said committee when the bill making appropriations for the Departments of State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor is being considered by the Committee on Appropriations, and at least one member of the Committee on Commerce shall be a member of the conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon said appropriation bill.

ATLANTIC-GULF SHIP CANAL, FLA. (S. DOC. NO. 147)

On motion by Mr. FLETCHER, the interim report of the special board of geologists and engineers appointed by the district engineer at Ocala, Fla., to make a study of the effect of the sea-level canal on the underground resources of the State was ordered to be printed, with illustrations, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The VICE PRESIDENT. Resolutions coming over from a previous day are in order.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the resolution (S. Res. 141) submitted by Mr. TYDINGS on May 21, 1935, favoring conferences with foreign governments on war debts and certain other international matters.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution go over and that the call of the calendar be dispensed with for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. Morning business is closed.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM OF NATIONAL FARMERS UNION

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, the National Farmers Union for many years has been one of the outstanding farm organizations. Its work for agriculture has been aggressive, effective, and in line with the needs and ambitions of a large proportion of our farm population. What the Farmers Union has to say as to the condition of agriculture, and of the needs of agriculture, and the legislative program for agriculture, in my judgment, is entitled to the best thought and consideration of the Congress and the country.

For this reason I am about to ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the legislative program of the National Farmers Union as approved at its recent annual convention November 19 and 20, 1935, at Kankakee, Ill. Especially I desire to call to the attention of my colleagues and to give my hearty endorsement to several points in that program. This Congress, in line with the recommendations of the Farmers Union, should enact the Frazier-Lemke farm refinancing bill. The farmer is entitled to the lower interest rates and the long-time mortgage loans provided in that bill.

Also I heartily concur in the Farmers Union position that gambling in farm products should be prohibited, and in opposition to war and war-breeding policies, including huge appropriations for war purposes.

I send to the desk a copy of the Farmers Union legislative program and ask unanimous consent that it be printed as part of my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL FARMERS UNION LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM; ADOPTED UNANIMOUSLY IN ANNUAL CONVENTION HELD IN KANKAKEE, ILL., NOVEMBER 19 AND 20, 1935

The Farmers Union has had a very definite national legislative program for many years. Very little of it has been adopted by the National Congress. There has been legislation passed involving the principles laid down in the Farmers Union program. Such legislation can only be described as a step in the right direction.

We have fought the manufacturers' general sales tax successfully.

We have seen our program on net income and inheritance tax receive consideration in the last 2 years to the extent of doubling the rates on the higher brackets.

The Agricultural Adjustment Act established as a principle of law that it is the duty of this Government to see that farmers are financed; that it is the duty of this Government to regulate the marketing of farm commodities; that the President should have the power to monetize silver and issue non-interest-bearing full legal-tender currency instead of interest-bearing bonds.

While these are steps in the right direction, the steps are so short that they get us nowhere. Time proves that what has been done is inadequate for the relief and recovery of our country.

All this means that we should be firmer than ever in our convictions that the Farmers Union program provides the real remedy.

In that belief we hereby reiterate the national legislative program adopted in many previous annual conventions of the National Farmers Union.

OUR PROGRAM

1. We unequivocally reendorse the Frazier-Lemke refinance bill, which bill provides for the refinancing of existing farm indebtedness at 1½-percent interest and 1½ percent on the principal of the indebtedness—not by the issuance of bonds but by a direct issuance of currency.

2. We endorse and demand the program of the nationalization of our money and credit through a central bank, owned and operated and controlled exclusively by the Government, establishing an honest measure of value with which to meet our obligations and measure the wealth of the Nation.

3. We further endorse the House joint resolution introduced by Congressman WILLIAM LEMKE, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the initiation of legislative measures by electors.

4. We demand the passage of the Thomas-Massingale cost-of-production bill granting an average cost of production as minimum prices for farm products and an adequate annual wage for labor as a sound basis for economic recovery and as a permanent policy for the development of a stabilized national economy.

5. The Wheeler bill, which provides for the remonetization of silver.

6. The Thomas bill, which provides for the Government issuing full legal-tender non-interest-bearing currency to pay the debts of the Nation instead of issuing more interest-bearing bonds.

7. We believe all taxation should be based on ability to pay. We further believe there is just one test of ability to pay, and that is net income at the end of the year. We therefore support such rates on net incomes as will pay the running expenses of government.

We realize that the concentration of wealth in the hands of a few, to the extent that, today in the United States, less than 5 percent of the people own 90 percent of the wealth of the Nation, is a menace to the life of the Nation. History teaches from Babylon to Russia that where such conditions exist one of two things happens, either there is redistribution of wealth or revolution and overthrow of the government.

To prevent the latter, the Farmers Union proposes such amendments to the inheritance- and gift-tax laws as will limit the amount any one individual can take from an estate to one-half million dollars.

8. We are opposed to the large appropriations being made in preparation for war.

For 40 years this Nation has preached peace—while at the same time spending more money every year on wars, past, present, and future, than any other country in the world. It is our position that such a policy is hypocritical and inconsistent.

We are also unalterably opposed to compulsory military training in any form and, especially, in tax-supported institutions of learning.

9. Farmers are the largest purchasers of gasoline of any group, hence the largest payers of gasoline taxes. We are opposed to the Federal taxes on gasoline and to the diversion of tax funds, raised by the various States, from road building and maintenance purposes.

10. We believe Congress should pass such legislation as would absolutely prohibit gambling in farm products by boards of trade, cotton exchanges, and other speculators.

11. It is our position that so long as industry is protected by tariffs, agriculture is entitled to the same protection.

12. We favor further and more effective legislation against the use of oriental oils in the manufacture of oleomargarine. Such legislation is needed to protect the dairy farmers of the Nation.

13. The eighteenth amendment has been repealed. We favor such legislation as will place the manufacture and distribution of all intoxicating liquors in the Government. This would remove "profit" which is the biggest element of evil in the liquor traffic.

14. We commend America's stand (enunciated by Congress and the President) against war.

In the event of war we demand the conscription of wealth the same as human lives.

15. Whereas the Oklahoma Farmers Union is blazing the trail for return of individual farmer and home ownership in America through legislation embodying such far-reaching measures as a graduated land tax and a homestead exemption, whereas their efforts along this line to date have been attended with notable success; and

Whereas a vast majority of our farmers throughout the Nation have been evicted, foreclosed, and dispossessed: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we highly commend Oklahoma for their initiative, and that we emulate their policy in restoring individual farm and home ownership by securing the enactment of State laws, exempting homesteads from part or all of ad-valorem taxes, also applying the principle of the graduated land tax.

16. We endorse the Frazier-Lemke conservation bill providing for the conservation of water from the eastern slope of the Rockies.

17. Whereas we have a Union of States, united on a national program, but many of the rank and file have been divided on policy; and

Whereas past experience has taught the farmers it is more important and effective to sell our legislative and cooperative program on its own merits rather than on the alleged demerits of some other program.

Therefore we commend a policy of disseminating and revealing statistical information and facts affecting our program and allowing membership to form conclusions of their own.

CHARLES A. LINDBERGH

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, Charles A. Lindbergh, who captured mankind's imagination when he crossed the Atlantic by riding alone the pathway of the stars, has lately been the subject of much discussion because, forsooth, as a discerning gentleman, after performing the duties cast upon him by a tragic occasion, he properly withdrew himself and his family from the house of his woe and sorrow until the conclusion of the case which affects himself and his family so poignantly.

Of course, no one except Colonel Lindbergh and his family knows the precise reason for his sojourn in England; but, in view of his well-known habit of observing the proprieties and amenities of life, it would not be a rash guess to say that he and Mrs. Lindbergh quite naturally preferred to be absent during the climax of the case.

It may be, indeed, that the Lindberghs are temporary refugees from the tyranny of curiosity. He and his family have been the victims of ruthless, reckless, and relentless espionage. If they wished to go shopping, attend a theater, a picture show, or go to a restaurant, they must needs disguise themselves or be pestered, annoyed, insulted, jostled, intimidated, and manhandled by cranks, potential gangsters, gaping sensation mongers, and other unrecorded, unidentified, and unauthorized individuals.

To some persons one of the truest joys that can come is to live serenely in obscurity the life of a private citizen; but, unfortunately, such a vast number of persons with a prurient, itching curiosity have been so constantly invading Colonel Lindbergh's right to privacy that he and his family for some months have been required practically to reside within a fortress.

This deplorable status of affairs may not be cured by any law or by any action that the Department of Justice may take. It can and will be remedied only and when those citizens who represent the good repute of our Nation, and who live courageously, shall themselves set an example of a refusal to violate the privacy of another citizen and an example of indignant resentment of any intrusion upon their own privacy.

Human beings differ in temperament, habits, and inclinations. A mode or plan of life agreeable to one person may be unpleasant to another. One man desires to be surrounded by gayety, laughter, and song; another prefers to keep company with invisible and inaudible things.

That a man should prefer his own silent and deploying thoughts, to bubbling comrades does not indicate that he lacks urbanity or warm-heartedness; it simply indicates that he has chosen companions agreeable to himself.

Some years ago I read an article, published I believe in the New York Sun, commenting on the trans-Atlantic flight made by Lindbergh. The article, as I remember it, was about as follows:

ALONE

He was not alone. He had imperial companions, but they were of the kind that did not weigh down his ship; and as his airplane winged her unwearied course he held communion with his companions who by their magic power always inspire and give strength to arm, resource to mind, and contentment to soul.

On his right hand sat Courage; on his left hand sat Self-Confidence; behind was Determination; over him was Ambition; and before him was Emprise reading the dials.

In conclusion I say, Americans who love sportsmanship and fair play should be content to allow the Lone Eagle to select his companions.

THE TOWNSEND PLAN—STATEMENT BY DR. HENRY S. PRITCHETT

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in full in the RECORD and appropriately referred a statement on the Townsend old-age-pension plan, written by Dr. Henry S. Pritchett, president emeritus of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching.

There being no objection, the statement was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE TOWNSEND RELIGION

There was something appealing in the gathering of some thousands of adherents of the Townsend plan in Chicago a few weeks ago. It was a company of believers—sincere, earnest, wistful. The assembly resembled those gatherings of Adventists that were common in the Middle West 50 years ago, when bands of sincere believers gathered at dawn on an appointed day to greet the resurrection morn that never came.

For the Townsend plan is not a plan. It is a religion. It rests on a simple faith in the prophecies of the good Dr. Townsend, who, like many other prophets, brushes aside the plain facts that stand in the way of the realization of his faith. These facts can be simply stated, and they do not require a trained economist to understand them. What we once called "horse sense" is all that is needed.

Under the Townsend plan every 60-year-old man or woman will automatically go on the pension list and receive $200 a month, or $2,400 a year, from the Government of the United States. As there are about ten and a half million 60-year-old persons, these pensions will cost $25,000,000,000 a year, increasing as population rises. This tidy sum has to be paid out of the income of all the people, the payments to be effected by a sales-transaction tax that will reach everybody. Every time a housewife buys a loaf of bread or a pound of bacon or a calico dress she will pay a sales tax to carry the Townsend pensions. Every man, woman, and child must contribute to the Townsend pensions in proportion to his annual expenditures.

Now, the total income of everybody in the United States last year, according to a Government report recently issued, was $49,000,000,000. This income is, in the main, in the hands of persons of moderate or small means, living on day wages or monthly salaries. Laboring men will be called on to pay the bulk of the Townsend pensions, because they receive and spend the bulk of the national income. It certainly looks a bit doubtful when the average man is asked to lay down half his income, collected by a sales tax, in order to pay the Townsend pensions.

No notice seems to have been taken of the fact that Townsend pensioners would be affected by the Townsend sales tax in quite the same way as any other purchaser of bread, meat, and clothing.

It is at this point that the prophet of the Townsend religion introduces his chief article of faith. Under the terms of the plan every 60-year-old must spend the entire $200 by the end of the month in which he receives it. For example, the $200 received January 1 must all be spent by February 1. Not a dollar must be left in his hands at the end of the month. This provision furnishes the greatest appeal to selfishness to which our human weaknesses have ever been exposed. The swapping of payments between pensioners will be a temptation which few will resist. It will require an army of inspectors to make sure that the endowed brethren are not merely swapping payments. The Townsend plan would become in practice the greatest corrupter of American life ever devised.

The chief article of faith in the Townsend credo lies in the assumption that the spending of this money—about two billions a month—will, in the language of the official pamphlet, "create purchasing power so that there may be Nation-wide prosperity."

There is something to be said for the proposition that the free spending of money helps trade and hence works for general prosperity. Most health resorts live, to a considerable extent, on the money spent by outsiders who frequent the resort and who bring their money with them. It would not stimulate business at a German spa, for example, if the money spent by the visitors had been obtained by collecting it first from the people of the town through a sales tax or by any other form of taxation.

And herein lies the fatal defect in the Townsend plan. It takes away from all the people (including the Townsend pensioners) over half their income, and thus makes it impossible for the 92 percent of the people not in the Townsend plan to spend any money. If good Dr. Townsend, the apostle of this faith, could get the twenty-five billions (plus expenses) from some outside source—perhaps the planet Mars—and hand it out to the ten and a half million 60-year-old persons to spend, his faith would be justified by his works. But there is no way to get the twenty-five billions except to take it away from the incomes arising from wages, salaries, and interest on investments. Mainly it would come from those living on wages and salaries—laborers, clerks, college professors, school teachers, and all who earn their livelihood by service in one form or another. The Townsend religion is based on a profound fallacy—the assumption that by taking billions away from all the people and giving it to a small minority to spend we can bring in prosperity. Townsendism is a sincere religion on the part of those who practice it. But sincerity is only one quality which a religion must have. It must not only feel; it must think straight. Neither religion nor economics can endure on a false foundation. The politicians who are flirting with the Townsend plan are playing with fire.

HENRY SMITH PRITCHETT.

THE BUDGET

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

Pursuant to provisions of law I transmit herewith the Budget of the United States Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, together with this message, which is definitely a part thereof. The estimates have been developed after careful analysis of the revenues, obligations, and reasonable needs of the Government, and I recommend appropriations for the purposes specifically detailed in the tables which follow.

PART I

No mortal is permitted unfailingly to predict the future. This is particularly true of estimates which relate to the money values of property and services in a world of nations torn by dissension, by violent price fluctuations, and by forebodings of the future.

It is, therefore, a cause for congratulation within our own Nation to realize that a consistent, broad national policy, adopted nearly 3 years ago by the Congress and the President, has thus far moved steadily, effectively, and successfully toward its objective.

In March 1933, in spite of substantial increases in tax rates during the preceding administration, Federal tax receipts had fallen to such a low level that even normal expenses of Government could not be carried on without creating a mounting deficit. In addition to normal expenses, the problem of millions of starving unemployed called for a relief program which obviously would greatly increase that deficit.

The national policy which we then adopted sought to stop the downward economic spiral by taking simultaneous action along a dozen fronts. The chief objectives were: To make bank deposits secure, to save farms and homes from foreclosure, to start public works on a large scale, to encourage home building, to increase farm crop values, to give useful work instead of a dole to the needy unemployed, to reduce all interest rates, to increase foreign trade in both exports and imports, to extend Government credit to railroads and other privately owned activities, to reduce unsound and generally disastrous speculation, to eliminate starvation wages, to seek a higher level of values, and then to maintain those values.

On the part of the Federal Government the many legislative acts creating the machinery for recovery were all predicated on two interdependent beliefs. First, the measures would immediately cause a great increase in the annual expenditures of the Government—many of these expenditures, however, in the form of loans which would ultimately return to the Treasury. Second, as a result of the simultaneous attack on the many fronts I have indicated, the receipts of the Government would rise definitely and sharply during the following few years, while greatly increased expenditure for the purposes stated, coupled with rising values and the stopping of losses would, over a period of years, diminish the need for work relief and thereby reduce Federal expenditures. The increase in revenues would ultimately meet and pass the declining cost of relief.

This policy adopted in the spring of 1933 has been confirmed in actual practice by the Treasury figures of 1934, of 1935, and by the estimates for the fiscal years of 1936 and 1937.

There is today no doubt of the fundamental soundness of the policy of 1933. If we proceed along the path we have followed and with the results attained up to the present time we shall continue our successful progress during the coming years.

Stated even more concisely, we can look forward today to a continued reduction of deficits, to increased tax receipts, and to declining expenditures for the needy unemployed. Let it be remembered that the major part of the increase in tax receipts anticipated in 1937 over 1936 from comparable sources is coming from old tax schedules. The only changes made last year in the tax schedule were, first, the elimination of the tax on checks and, secondly, slight increases in taxes on large incomes, on large estates, and on large corporations and in capital stock and excess-profits taxes. By the elimination of the tax on checks we lost $40,000,000 in revenue and the slight increases on estates and on personal and corporate incomes will add only about $222,000,000 to Government receipts this coming year. I emphasize that the great bulk of increased Government income referred to above results from increased earning power and profits throughout the Nation and not from the new taxes imposed by the Revenue Act of 1935.

Final success will depend, of course, on the strength of the efforts put forth by the employers of the United States greatly to increase the number of persons employed by them. The finances of the Government are in better condition than at any time in the past 7 years. I say this because starting with the autumn of 1929 tax receipts began a steady and alarming decline, while, at the same time, Government expenditures began a steady rise; today tax receipts are continuing a steady climb which commenced in the summer of 1933, whereas Budget estimates for the next fiscal year will show a decreased need for appropriations.

The credit of the Government is at its highest. The average of the businessmen of the Nation stand ready to do their share. It is to be hoped that motives and attacks which spring only from the desire for political or financial power on the part of a few will not retard the steady progress we are making.

Our policy is succeeding. The figures prove it. Secure in the knowledge that steadily decreasing deficits will turn in time into steadily increasing surpluses and that it is the deficit of today which is making possible the surplus of tomorrow, let us pursue the course that we have mapped.

In my Budget message of January 1935 I said:

I am, however, submitting to the Congress a Budget for the fiscal year 1936 which balances except for expenditures to give work to the unemployed. If this Budget receives approval of the Congress, the country will henceforth have the assurance that with the single exception of this item every current expenditure of whatever nature will be fully covered by our estimates of current receipts. Such deficit as occurs will be due solely to this cause, and it may be expected to decline as rapidly as private industry is able to reemploy those who now are without work.

In looking at the revised estimates for the fiscal year 1936 I am more than pleased to find that we have not only accomplished what I said we would in my Budget message of a year ago but that the results with respect to both expenditures and receipts have surpassed expectations.

1. My Budget message of January 1935 forecast that the expenditures for the fiscal year 1936 would be $8,520,000,000. Our most recent estimate shows that our expenditures will be $7,645,000,000, or $875,000,000 less than originally forecast.

2. Receipts were estimated in January 1935 at $3,992,000,000. At the present time it appears that they will be $4,411,000,000, or an increase of $419,000,000.

3. The message of January 1935 forecast a gross deficit of $4,528,000,000, and the most recent figures show that the deficit will be $3,234,000,000, or a decrease of $1,294,000,000

This great improvement of the fiscal outlook during this present year has been brought about through policies which the Congress and the President initiated in 1933 and which we have since maintained.

Now let us look at the Budget for the fiscal year 1937:

To run all the regular activities of the Government I will need a total of $5,069,000,000. These regular activities include interest on the public debt, major public works, operations of the Civilian Conservation Corps, and agricultural benefit payments, but do not include strictly work-relief items. I expect to pay for these regular activities with estimated receipts of $5,654,000,000, leaving an excess of receipts of $585,000,000. Out of this $585,000,000 I will need $580,000,000 for debt retirement, which will still leave $5,000,000 of excess receipts over expenditures after having paid for all of the regular expenditures of the Government plus debt retirement.

The item for relief remains. Without that item the Budget is in balance. To make today a formal Budget estimate of the amount necessary for work relief would be of necessity a difficult task. We have too recently reached our goal of putting three and one-half million people at work; and the beneficial effects from this program and from increasing expenditures on public works cannot be foretold as accurately today as it can 2 months from now. Furthermore, employment by private industry continues to show substantial gains over the figures of a year ago. It is reasonably certain that the total appropriations for work relief during the fiscal year 1937 will be far less than during the current fiscal year. It is estimated in this Budget that expenditures for recovery and relief out of unexpended balances of previous emergency appropriations will amount to $1,103,000,000. Including these expenditures the gross deficit for 1937, without an estimate for additional work relief, is less than the gross deficit for 1936 by $2,136,000,000. I do not anticipate that the need for additional relief funds will be as great as that sum.

To state the case even more precisely, the gross deficit of the Government in 1934 was $3,989,000,000; in 1935, $3,575,000,000; in 1936 (estimate), $3,234,000,000; and in 1937 (estimated but not including any new appropriations for work relief), $1,098,000,000. Therefore, it is clear: First, that since June 30, 1934, the gross deficit of the Government shows a steady decrease during the fiscal years 1935 and 1936. Second, that if work relief appropriations by this session of the Congress were made up to a total of $2,136,000,000, the total gross deficit for the fiscal year 1937 would not exceed that of 1936, which was the lowest gross deficit of the past 3 years. Therefore, it follows that by whatever amount the appropriation for work relief at this session is less than $2,136,000,000, the gross deficit for 1937 will be less than the deficit for 1936 by the same amount.

With this limitation and this excellent prospect clearly in mind, I am not including in this Budget estimates for additional relief appropriations. I shall transmit such estimates with far greater knowledge and, therefore, with greater accuracy in sufficient time before the adjournment of this session to give the Congress full opportunity to examine into the subject and to make the necessary appropriations.

The credit of the Government is in sound condition. On October 15, 1933, wartime issues of first and fourth Liberty bonds were outstanding in the aggregate amount of $8,200,000,000, bearing interest at an average rate of about 4⅛ percent. Today this entire amount has been refunded, of which about $5,000,000,000 was exchanged for long-term bonds bearing interest at rates ranging from 2¾ to 3¼ percent per annum; $1,900,000,000 was exchanged for Treasury notes bearing interest from 1½ to 2½ percent per annum, and the balance was paid in cash. The average rate on the securities issued to refund the Liberty bonds is less than 2¾ percent per annum, a saving of approximately 1⅜ percent a year, or an annual reduction in interest payments of more than $100,000,000 on these particular securities.

The average rate on the interest-bearing debt was on June 30, 1934, approximately 3.18 percent, whereas on November 30, 1935, it had been reduced to 2.575 percent.

If the Congress enacts legislation at the coming session which will impose additional charges upon the Treasury for which provision is not already made in this Budget, I strongly urge that additional taxes be provided to cover such charges. It is important as we emerge from the depression that no new activities be added to the Government unless provision is made for additional revenue to meet their cost.

PART II

RECOMMENDATIONS

The following recommendations are offered:

Appropriation transfer provisions.—The text accompanying a number of the estimates of appropriations has been drafted to include provision for transfer between appropriations within the same department. This provision will add a measure of administrative flexibility and will tend to promote economical execution of the program as a whole, and approval thereof by the Congress is recommended.

Repeal amendment to Agricultural Adjustment Act.—During the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress the Agricultural Adjustment Act was amended so as to appropriate a sum equal to 30 percent of customs receipts to the Secretary of Agriculture to encourage exportation and domestic consumption of agricultural commodities. No estimate of expenditure for account of this legislation is included herein; and repeal of the amendment is recommended for the following reasons:

By appropriating directly instead of authorizing an appropriation the amendment denies to the President the opportunity to consider the need and include appropriate estimates in the Budget; and it denies to the Congress the opportunity to review such estimates in their relation to the whole program of the Government. The amendment violates the principles of the Permanent Appropriation Repeal Act of 1934, and of the Budget and Accounting Act of June 10, 1921. It is in conflict with sound administration in that it provides in advance for large annual expenditures without any attempt to coordinate income and expense. The amendment was passed in the last days of the session as a result of conference agreement and without the debate and consideration by the Congress which the import of the measure clearly justifies.

Apportionments of appropriations.—Within the last few months control of the administrative expense of 20 emergency agencies has been vested in the Bureau of the Budget, which after a general survey of all of them has effected substantial reductions in proposed expenditures for administrative purposes. Allowances for administrative expenses are subject to such adjustment as the status of the agency warrants.

The 20 agencies brought under the Budget are the Agricultural Adjustment Administration; Commodity Credit Corporation; Electric Home and Farm Authority; Export-Import Banks (2); Farm Credit Administration; Federal Coordinator of Transportation; Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation; Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works; Federal Emergency Relief Administration; Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation; Federal Home Loan Bank Board; Federal Housing Administration; Federal Savings and Loan System; Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation; Federal Surplus Relief Corporation; Home Owners' Loan Corporation; National Recovery Administration; Reconstruction Finance Corporation and Tennessee Valley Authority.

It is recommended that section 3679 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to bring all agencies of the Government, including Government-owned and Government-controlled corporations, within the authority of the Director of the Budget with respect to apportionments of appropriations and of other funds available to them.

PART III

REVIEW OF FISCAL YEARS 1935 AND 1936 AND THE FISCAL PROGRAM OF 1937

This review concerns itself with cash actually received and paid out by the Treasury in the fiscal year 1935 and with the estimates of receipts, appropriations, and expenditures for the fiscal years 1936 and 1937. As elsewhere stated herein the program of regular activities for 1937 includes activities under the Agricultural Adjustment Act and the Civilian Conservation Corps (Emergency Conservation Work), heretofore classed as emergency. Therefore the figures used herein for 1934, 1935, and 1936 have been adjusted to a comparable basis.

FISCAL YEAR 1935

Receipts.—Treasury receipts for the year ended June 30, 1935, were in excess of estimates prepared a year ago. Considering all sources except postal revenues, total receipts amounted to $3,800,467,202, or $89,000,000 above the estimate. Internal revenue, including processing taxes on farm products, produced $3,277,690,028, exceeding the estimate by $80,000,000. Customs receipts amounted to $343,353,033, an increase over the estimate of $56,000,000. Miscellaneous receipts, including realization upon assets, estimated at $227,184,181, fell short of the estimate by $48,000,000; the amount actually received under this item was $179,424,140.

Expenditures.—While actual receipts for the year were greater than anticipated, actual expenditures were less than the amount estimated by $1,205,000,000. The aggregate of all expenditures was $7,375,825,166, against an estimate of $8,581,069,026. Approximately a billion dollars of this difference related to recovery and relief, and the regular agencies accounted for the remainder.

The total spent for recovery and relief was $3,068,803,053, whereas the 1936 Budget estimate was $4,068,541,852, exclusive of expenditures made under the Agricultural Adjustment Act and made by the Civilian Conservation Corps. This difference is partly due to this fact:

When the Budget for 1936 was prepared it seemed probable that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, in all accounts except relief, would close the year with an excess of loans over repayments; and the amount of the net expenditures was estimated at $556,000,000. However, because of improved business conditions, the demands for Corporation assistance were so much less than estimated and the repayments of loans so much greater, that the Corporation actually closed the year with net receipts of $107,000,000. Therefore, the net difference between the estimated expenditure and the actual result amounted to $663,000,000. Other agencies spent for recovery and relief $337,000,000 less than estimated.

For the operation and maintenance of regular departments and establishments of the Government, including the Agricultural Adjustment Act and the Civilian Conservation Corps, actual expenditures were $2,912,537,509, against the estimate of $3,104,961,174.

For statutory debt retirements there was expended $573,558,250, and for interest on the public debt $820,926,353, whereas the amounts budgeted for these items were, respectively, $572,566,000 and $835,000,000.

Deficit and public debt.—The year closed with a gross deficit of $3,575,357,964, instead of the estimate of $4,869,418,338. After deducting the amount paid out for statutory debt retirement, the net deficit was $3,001,799,714. The increase in the total outstanding gross public debt was $1,647,751,210, which figure is properly obtained by subtracting from the net deficit the decrease in the general-fund balance, the excess of receipts from trust funds, increment on gold, etc., over expenditures from the same accounts, and the amount of retirement of national-bank notes from the gold increment. As of June 30, 1935, the total outstanding gross public debt was $28,700,892,624, while on June 30, 1934, it was $27,053,141,414.

Drawing upon the experience of the first 6 months of the current year it is possible to forecast with a fair degree of accuracy the results of financial operations for the whole 1936 fiscal period.

Receipts.—The same sources of income (excluding postal revenues) which a year ago were expected to produce receipts aggregating $3,991,904,639 are now expected to produce a total of $4,410,793,946.

Of the items comprising the whole, income taxes will develop $1,434,112,000, or $246,000,000 more than the 1936 Budget estimate.

Miscellaneous internal revenue, exclusive of processing taxes, is now estimated at $1,873,091,000, an increase of $187,000,000. Receipts from customs are expected to reach a total of $353,191,000, exceeding the original estimate by $55,000,000. Other changes, some upward and some downward, result in the new estimate of total receipts at a figure of $419,000,000 higher than shown in the Budget for 1936, which was presented a year ago.

The present estimate for processing taxes in 1936, included in above total, is in round figures $529,000,000, as against the original estimate of $570,000,000. Actual receipts for the 5 months ended November 30, 1935, totaled $56,000,000, while up to that date approximately $148,000,000 of due payments had been impounded as the result of preliminary court action.

It is pertinent to repeat here a statement appearing in the Summation of the 1936 Budget:

> Estimates of receipts contemplate continued collection of processing taxes. If the attack which has been made upon this act is sustained, we will have to face the problem of financing existing contracts for benefit payments out of some form of new taxes.

Two new taxes, namely, the bituminous-coal tax and the taxes upon carriers and their employees, both representing recent legislation, will contribute $39,000,000 not included in the original estimate of receipts for 1936. New taxes imposed by the Social Security Act and the Revenue Act of 1935 will not produce any income until the fiscal year 1937.

Expenditures.—Indications are that expenditures, including debt retirement during the present fiscal year, will not reach the amount budgeted by approximately $875,000,000; the total now foreseen is $7,645,301,338, against the original estimate of $8,520,413,609. Exclusive of debt retirement, the total of expenditures is now estimated at $7,093,276,338, while the original comparable figure was $7,883,979,609. For recovery and relief the revised estimate of expenditures for the fiscal year 1936 is less than the original Budget estimate by $738,000,000, and expenditures for all regular purposes, including Agricultural Adjustment Act and Civilian Conservation Corps, will be less by $137,000,000. Debt retirement will require $84,000,000 less than was budgeted and interest payments will be $133,000,000 less. All regular exenditures, excluding service on the public debt, will be greater than the original Budget estimate by about $80,000,000.

The reduction in interest payments from the amount budgeted, as referred to above, was due largely to the refunding of first and fourth Liberty Loan bonds aggregating $8,200,000,000 at substantially lower rates of interest.

Deficit and public debt.—The revised estimates as set out herein show a gross deficit for the current fiscal year of approximately $3,234,000,000 instead of the original Budget forecast of $4,529,000,000. After deducting the amount of statutory debt retirement the net deficit will be, in round figures $2,682,000,000. The gross public debt as at June 30, 1936, should not be greater than $31,000,000,000. This estimate assumes that the working balance in the Treasury on June 30, 1936, will be approximately the same as it was on June 30, 1935, namely, $1,001,142,951. Obviously, if the working balance is less, the gross debt will be less; and if it is greater, the gross debt will be greater.

The foregoing figures are set out in the following table for ready comparison between Budget estimates of a year ago and what are now considered probable.

Comparison of original and revised estimates, fiscal year 1936, adjusted to classification of expenditures in 1937 Budget

	Budget estimate, January 1935	Revised estimate
1. Receipts (excluding postal):
Income tax	$1,188,000,000	$1,434,112,000
Miscellaneous internal revenue	1,685,900,000	1,873,091,000
Processing taxes on farm products	570,000,000	529,042,030
Customs	298,000,000	353,191,000
All other	250,004,639	221,357,946
Total receipts	3,991,904,639	4,410,793,946
2. Expenditures:
Regular, including A. A. A. and C. C. C.	3,402,351,134	3,482,208,151
Interest on the public debt	875,000,000	742,000,000
Recovery and relief	3,606,628,475	2,869,068,187
Total expenditures	7,883,979,609	7,093,276,338
3. Net deficit	3,892,074,970	2,682,482,392
Statutory debt retirements	636,434,000	552,025,000
Gross deficit	4,528,508,970	3,234,507,392
4. Gross public debt	34,238,823,656	30,933,375,017

Postal revenues for the fiscal year 1936 are now estimated at $670,000,000, which is $25,000,000 over the original estimate.

THE FISCAL PROGRAM OF 1937

There is presented here a brief factual résumé of the principal features of the Budget for the fiscal year 1937, the details of which appear in subsequent text and tables. A few high points stand out and justify emphasis.

Without impairing the ability of the Government to carry on its normal functions and to prosecute those activities essential to continued recovery, the Budget reflects a substantial decrease in the spread between income and outgo. This is consistent with the prediction made in the Budget message a year ago and is possible because of progressive improvement in the economic status of the people. The state of national recovery is such that receipts from prevailing tax sources on the basis of present rates appear adequate for financing the ordinary operations of the Government in 1937, including service on the public debt; and no new or additional taxes are proposed.

Legislation enacted by the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress makes it necessary to provide in the 1937 estimates new appropriation items aggregating $667,000,000. This total will become approximately $767,000,000 should the Congress reject the recommendation, hereinbefore offered, for repeal of that part of the Agricultural Adjustment Act which appropriates a sum equal to 30 percent of customs receipts to the Secretary of Agriculture.

Legislation enacted by the first session also permits including in these estimates a total of $769,000,000 of additional receipts, of which about 70 percent will accrue under the Bituminous Coal Conservation Act, the act levying taxes upon carriers and their employees, and the Social Security Act. It is worthy of note that but slightly less than 30 percent of this increase will be derived under the Revenue Act of 1935. This act, it will be recalled, slightly increased taxes on individuals whose net incomes exceed $50,000 per year; slightly increased estate taxes on larger fortunes with a corresponding increase in gift taxes; and in respect of corporations, decreased taxes on net earnings of small corporations while increasing in relative ratio the taxes on net income of larger corporations. The act also provided for an increase in taxes on capital stock and on excess profits of corporations. The effect of the excess-profits tax was to increase taxes on corporations which earned in excess of certain percentages of their adjusted declared value of capital stock.

The total revenue expected to be produced by these taxes in the fiscal year 1937 will be only $222,000,000, or 11 percent, over the income, estate, gift, capital-stock, and excess-profits taxes under the old law. Since collections in the fiscal year 1937 from income taxes and the estate tax only partially reflect the Revenue Act of 1935, the above amount will be somewhat larger on a full-year basis.

A Federal public-works program of $405,000,000 is recommended to meet in part the development and improvement requirements of the Government, and as a proper Federal contribution to work opportunity. While this program represents an increase of about $187,000,000 over the amount for similar purposes for which the Congress made specific appropriations for the current fiscal year, it is $333,000,000 less than the total amount made available for Federal public works in 1936, considering allotments made from emergency funds.

The success attending the operations of the Civilian Conservation Corps and the Agricultural Adjustment Administration under emergency status justifies taking them into the Budget and program for 1937 as regular activities, and the estimates of appropriations and expenditures have been prepared accordingly. The appropriation recommended for Civilian Conservation Corps is for the period March 31, 1936, to March 31, 1937, and amounts to $246,000,000, while the appropriation for the Agricultural Adjustment Administration is for the full year and amounts to $499,054,985.

The following table gives a clear picture of the main figures proposed in this Budget and shows how they compare with similar figures for previous years.

Directing attention to a comparison between fiscal operations proposed for 1937 and now estimated for 1936, as set forth in the table, the following comment is pertinent:

Receipts.—Receipts in 1937 (exclusive of postal revenues and processing taxes and also, for purposes of comparison, exclusive of taxes imposed under the Social Security Act, the Bitmuinous Coal Conservation Act, and the act levying taxes upon carriers and their employees) are expected to reach a total of $4,559,817,650, an increase of $716,665,704 over similar receipts for 1936 now estimated at $3,843,151,946, and $1,280,730,319 over 1935. It should be pointed out here that this increase is due largely to increased collections anticipated under the old schedules. As has been stated, only about $222,000,000 will be collected in 1937 as a result of new schedules in the Revenue Act of 1935.

From processing taxes the sum anticipated is $547,300,000, against the estimate of $529,042,000 for the current year, an increase of $18,258,000. Other taxes recently authorized by the Congress under the Social Security Act, the Bituminous Coal Conservation Act, and the act levying taxes upon carriers and their employees will produce $547,100,000 in 1937 and $38,600,000 this year, an increase of $508,500,000.

Thus 1937 receipts from all sources, except postal revenues, are estimated at $5,654,217,650, against the revised estimate of $4,410,793,946 for the current fiscal year. The increase in total receipts from stated sources is, therefore, $1,243,423,704.

Postal receipts for the coming year are estimated at $705,000,000, an increase of $35,000,000 over $670,000,000 anticipated in 1936. This is further evidence of the upward trend in economic conditions.

An examination of the detailed estimates of receipts for 1937 indicates a gain over 1936 in income tax of $508,488,000, the figures for the 2 years being respectively $1,942,600,000 and $1,434,112,000. Similarly, estimated receipts from miscellaneous internal revenue, exclusive of processing taxes, are up from $1,873,091,000 to $2,103,114,000, a gain of $230,023,000. Customs receipts are forecast at $354,000,000, substantially the same as anticipated for 1936. The reduction of $22,654,296 in probable miscellaneous receipts, from $182,757,946 to $160,103,650, brings the net increase in the estimates of these four classes of receipts to $716,665,704, as stated.

The provisions of the Social Security Act, the Bituminous Coal Conservation Act, and the act levying taxes upon carriers and their employees are such that receipts during the fiscal year 1936 will be compartively small while revenues from these sources in the next fiscal year will show substantial increases. The amounts estimated for 1937 from such new taxes in the order named are $433,200,000, $12,300,000, and $101,600,000.

Expenditures.—The expenditures for 1937 contemplated under this Budget will total $6,752,606,370, or approximately $893,000,000 less than is now estimated for 1936.

Of the two major categories of expenditure, namely, regular and recovery and relief, allowances for regular activities, including the Agricultural Adjustment Act and Civilian Conservation Corps, amount to $5,649,781,738 as compared with $4,776,233,151 for 1936, an increase of $873,548,587. For recovery and relief, expenditures listed herein are those which will be made from unexpended balances, practically all of which will have been obligated prior to June 30, 1936, and practically all of which have been allotted. The total of such expenditures in 1937 is estimated at $1,102,824,632, which is a decrease of $1,766,243,555 from the figure of $2,869,068,187 for 1936.

In regular expenditures there is included $805,000,000 for interest on the public debt, an increase of $63,000,000 over the same item for the current year; and $580,125,000 for statutory debt retirements, an increase of $28,100,000. The cost of service on the public debt in 1937, therefore, will exceed that for 1936 by $91,100,000.

Excepting debt retirement and interest, the net increase in expenditures for regular activities is $782,448,587 as compared with 1936. The major part of this increase is accounted for as follows: (a) For financing activities under the Social Security Act, the act levying taxes upon carriers and their employees, and the Bituminous Coal Conservation Act, $485,000,000; (b) for other new legislation, $125,000,000; (c) for increased public works, transferred from emergency appropriations, $228,000,000; (d) for the veterans' adjusted-service certificate fund in order to bring the annual contribution of the Government nearer its actual liability under existing law, $60,000,000; and (e) for national defense, to meet the policy of the Congress and the Executive in making up for the delay by the United States in bringing the Navy up to the strength contemplated by the naval treaties of 1922 and 1930, and to provide replacement and improved equipment and additional personnel for the Army, $193,000,000.

In the War Department Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1935 the Congress adopted a policy of increasing the average enlisted strength of the Army from 118,750 to 165,000 men and toward accomplishing such purpose appropriated an additional $20,000,000 for expenditure during that year. These funds are sufficient to maintain an average enlisted strength during 1936 of approximately 147,000 men. The estimates of expenditure included in this Budget are sufficient in amount to maintain this average during the fiscal year 1937, with the purpose in view of providing in the 1938 Budget the funds necessary to recruit the Army to such strength by the close of that year as will produce an average enlisted strength of 165,000 throughout the fiscal year 1939, the maximum indicated by the Congress. It is felt that this is as fast as the Government should proceed in this matter in the light of the present forecast of fiscal affairs.

The contemplated expenditures for the Civilian Conservation Corps show a decrease of $308,383,000 as against estimated comparable expenditures for 1936.

Deficit and public debt.—The gross deficit for the fiscal year 1937 is estimated at $1,098,388,720, including $580,125,000 for statutory debt retirement, or a net deficit of $518,263,720. It is estimated that the gross public debt on June 30, 1937, will amount to $31,351,638,737, as compared with an estimated debt on June 30, 1936, of $30,933,375,017. The figure for 1937 does not include such amounts for work relief during the coming year as may be determined upon by the Congress.

Appropriations.—Appropriations recommended in this Budget aggregate $6,400,000,000, including probable supplemental items estimated at $600,000,000, while the appropriations already made and prospective supplemental items for the fiscal year 1936, exclusive of the appropriation of $4,000,000,000 for recovery and relief, amount to $5,146,000,000, an increase of $1,254,000,000 required for the fiscal year 1937 over the fiscal year 1936.

This increase is due to (1) additional appropriations amounting to approximately $610,000,000, including supplementals to be submitted later, required to finance new legislation enacted at the last session of Congress; (2) an appropriation of $246,000,000 to continue the operations of the Civilian Conservation Corps from March 31, 1936, to March 31, 1937; (3) an increase in specific appropriations of $187,000,000 on account of general public works; and (4) increases in the general departmental requirements aggregating approximately $211,000,000, due largely to the increases in the Army, Navy, and the Department of Agriculture.

Existing authorizations for the Federal-aid highway system provide for appropriations of $125,000,000 for each of the fiscal years 1936 and 1937. Under these authorizations $40,000,000 has previously been appropriated for the fiscal year 1936. Toward the balance of $85,000,000 authorized for that year there is provided under the item "General public-works program" an estimate of $60,000,000, which it is believed will be sufficient to meet commitments maturing during 1937. As to the authorization of $125,000,000 for the fiscal year 1937, language is included in this Budget having for its purpose the cancelation of this authorization for 1937 and making it applicable to the fiscal year 1938. This course appears fully justified in view of the fact that during the fiscal years 1933 to 1936, inclusive, there has been made available from emergency funds a total of approximately $1,192,000,000 for the construction of highways and the elimination of grade crossings, and that from these funds there will be available for expenditure during the fiscal year 1937 a total of more than $250,000,000 in addition to the $60,000,000 provided for in the general public-works program, previously referred to. Moreover, roads of secondary classification and farm-to-market roads are being constructed under allotments of emergency funds in amounts approximating $115,000,000.

The following table shows the approximate estimate of appropriations required to administer new legislation enacted during the last session of Congress, and also shows the amount of receipts anticipated in 1937 from new general tax provisions.

	Estimated appropriations, 1937
Social Security Act	$479,689,840
Railroad Retirement Act	47,645,000
Bituminous Coal Conservation Act	1,155,000
Amendments, pension laws	45,581,132
Postal 40-hour week	27,326,420
Elimination, diseased cattle	17,500,000
Soil conservation	27,500,000
Agricultural research and extension	11,000,000
Reduction interest rate, Federal land banks	10,065,075
Total	667,462,467
Estimated receipts from taxes under the Social Security Act, the act levying taxes upon carriers and their employees, and the Bituminous Coal Conservation Act	547,100,000

Because there has not been sufficient time to plan the organization and methods required, no detailed estimates are included in the Budget for expense to be incurred by the Social Security Board and by the Bureau of Internal Revenue for collecting taxes authorized by the three new acts heretofore referred to. However, the probable expense has been approximated and is included in the total lump sum of $600,000,000 estimated to cover 1937 supplementals. The necessary estimates covering the remainder of the current year will be transmitted during the early days of the session, together with complete details for 1937. Likewise, no estimate for administering the Potato Act has been prepared, since it is believed this act should be amended along lines to be recommended by the Secretary of Agriculture, and a supplemental estimate can then be transmitted.

THE MAINTENANCE OF PEACE

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, it had been my intention to discuss today the violation of peace treaties and the alternative, for the maintenance of the peace of our citizens. I realize that Senators desire to adjourn as there are other matters to which their attention must be given, so I shall postpone that discussion until a later time.

However, I have had occasion to discuss this subject outside of the Senate. My views were not accurately expressed in the press at that time, and I was subjected to considerable criticism. I desire that those who are particularly interested in the question shall know my views with regard to it. I have not the time now to discuss it, but shall do so later.

Last Saturday, over a national and international radio hook-up, there was conducted a symposium in which speakers all over the world participated, several of whom touched on this very subject. I shall ask to place their speeches in the RECORD as soon as they can be obtained. One speaker from Tokyo seemed to hold the same views that I hold with regard to this matter. Also there was quite a similarity in the expression of views from Russia and from London. On that occasion I participated in the symposium, my remarks being in the form of an interview. The interview was conducted by Mr. William K. Hutchinson, of the International News Service. Pending the time when I shall discuss the matter fully on the floor of the Senate I ask permission to insert that interview in the RECORD as a part of my present remarks.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RADIO INTERVIEW OF SENATOR KEY PITTMAN BY WILLIAM K. HUTCHINSON

Q. Senator PITTMAN, you have traveled around the world and many times in Europe and the Orient. As a member of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate for 20 years you have studied foreign questions. I should like, therefore, to have your opinion as to how we can maintain honorable peace for our citizens.

A. In the first place, let me assert that everybody favors peace except a few warlike people. There are only two ways for us to maintain such peace. One is through treaties; the other is by maintaining a sufficient military force to command respect for our Government and protection for our citizens. Treaties that propose to protect the lives and property of nationals through arbitration or other juridical methods, and otherwise eliminate the dangers of war, would be the more humane and enlightened method. But such treaties are of no force and effect unless they are respected and obeyed by all the signatory powers. On the contrary, they become a delusion and a snare and the means by which unscrupulous governments take advantage of other governments who do recognize the sanctity of treaties. I have always supported such treaties, but I must admit that the evidence so far is conclusive, to my mind, that peace treaties have failed on every vital occasion to accomplish the high purpose for which they were intended. I hope that respect for them will be restored, but until that time arrives we will be forced to resort to the alternative—that is, to command respect for our Government and insure the safety and rights of our citizens through the maintenance of adequate naval and air forces. I say "naval and air forces" because we are fortunately situated in the United States. Our neighbors are friendly and we are protected by vast oceans on our shores. These forms of military forces are, fortunately, most economical, and in war endanger the lives of but few of our citizens. It is claimed that there is another alternative, and that is that our citizens and our ships remain within the continental borders of the United States. That is exactly what China did 1,800 years ago. China built a great wall around her country; but see what has happened to China under such extreme, pacific policy. Let our Navy fall into obsolescence, and even this latter alternative could not prevent our coast from being raided, our cities bombed, and the lives of our people taken.

Q. Do you regard the violation of any of these treaties as a threat to the United States?

A. I do.

Q. By what country?

A. By Japan.

Q. Do you regard the course being pursued by Japan and the evident aspiration of its present military government as threatening our interests and influence in the Pacific?

A. I do.

Q. Why, Senator?

A. Japan was a member of the League of Nations as well as China, and while a member of the League of Nations Japan invaded Manchuria, a part of China, with armed forces. She took possession of China's territory and ousted China's sovereignty and administration. The question was submitted to the League of Nations by China and Japan. The League decided that Japan was the aggressor and had been and was violating the covenants of the League of Nations. Japan treated that verdict with contempt, walked out of the conference, and proceeded more actively with the conquest of Manchuria, winding up the invasion by the establishment of the Japanese puppet government of Manchukuo. Now, Japan had subscribed, not only to the covenants of the League of Nations but also to the Kellogg-Briand Pact outlawing war and to the Nine Power Pact in which each government solemnly on its word of honor promised "to respect the sovereignty, the independence, and the territorial and administrative integrity of China." Japan, by reason of her action in Manchuria, in my opinion, violated the solemn covenants of all of these treaties. Now, apparently, she is again violating these treaties by attempting to take more territory away from China through the establishment of another Japanese puppet government in north China. All of China may be absorbed in this subtle way. Yes; Japan might even establish puppet governments in the islands of the Pacific. Japan may believe that such policy and such expansion are essential to her welfare, prosperity, and power. Nevertheless, such reasons have ever been given for conquest, and certainly such policy is inconsistent with the policy established in all recent peace treaties.

Q. Do you regard the consummation of that policy as a threat against the rights and peace of our citizens?

A. Undoubtedly. It has already practically destroyed our trade in Manchuria; and conditions are such in that territory that our missionaries and educational and business institutions may find it necessary to leave. The establishment of a new puppet government in north China, in my opinion, will have the same injurious effect. The evidence leads me to believe that the aspirations of the present military government of Japan envisions conquest of all eastern Asia and possibly all of the islands of the western Pacific.

Q. Does that mean eventual war between Japan and the United States?

A. The United States has not now, and never has had, any intention of attacking Japan. Its naval and air forces would be inferior to such forces of the Japanese Government in Japanese waters. Our Government has at all times admitted this, and the Japanese Government knows it. But, if the evident aspirations of the present military government of Japan are carried to their full consummation, not only will our commerce and influence in China be destroyed but it is not beyond the realm of possibility that our citizens and others dependent upon the United States for protection may be so imposed upon that it will be the moral duty of the United States to take action.

Q. Thank you, Senator PITTMAN.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT TO THURSDAY

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its labors today it adjourn until Thursday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGILL in the chair). Is there objection?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, may I ask the able Senator from Arkansas whether an adjournment will, in his opinion, disturb the priority on Thursday of the special order which is printed on the Senate calendar of business of today and which reads as follows:

SPECIAL ORDER

Ordered, by unanimous consent, That S. 3398, a bill to establish the Air Corps Technical School and to acquire certain land in the State of Colorado for use as a site for said Air Corps Technical School and as an aerial gunnery and bombing range for the Army Air Corps, be made a special order for the third day of the second session of the Seventy-fourth Congress. (Aug. 23, 1935.)

Mr. ROBINSON. I have stated to the Senator that it does not, and I now state to the Senate that it does not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas? The Chair hears none, and the order is entered.

REFERENCE OF NOMINATIONS OR TREATIES

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask the entry of the order which I send to the desk. I may state to the Senate that it is in identical form with orders entered at the last session and preceding sessions of the Senate and is for the convenience of the Senate.

There being no objection, the order was read and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That on calendar days of the present session of the Congress, when no executive session is held, nominations or treaties received from the President of the United States may, where no objection is interposed, be referred as in executive session to the appropriate committees by the Presiding Officer of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGILL in the chair), as in executive session, laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

THE UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT—ARTICLE BY SENATOR BORAH

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the distinguished senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] contributes to a current magazine a powerful, persuasive, and timely discussion of the Supreme Court of the United States and its place in American history, tradition, jurisprudence, and philosophy of government. The subject never has been more sturdily assessed than in this splendid article from the pen and brain and experience of this great constitutional spokesman. It deserves wider distribution for the sake of American institutions. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am asked by Redbook Magazine certain questions about the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court is again the subject of intense controversial discussion. Questions about it are debated throughout the land.

The first question propounded is:

By what authority does the Supreme Court exert the power to void an act of Congress on the ground that it is unconstitutional?

The assertion is made that no such power was conferred upon the Court in the beginning, and that it exerts it through usurpation. The question therefore really is:

Are we living under a usurped judicial power?

My answer is, "No." We are not living under a usurped judicial power. The power of the Court to void an act of Congress on the ground that it is unconstitutional is plainly and unmistakably conferred by the terms of the Constitution.

I understand perfectly that whenever the Court renders a decision of great moment, holding that a statute is in conflict with the Constitution and therefore void, John Marshall is again summoned to the bar of public opinion and denounced as a usurper. That has been going on for over a hundred years. No greater myth was ever paraded before an intelligent people.

It is an indisputable historic fact that, at the time John Marshall wrote the opinion in Madison against Marbury, announcing the doctrine that a statute in conflict with the Constitution must be held void, this doctrine was well established, and had been for years, in our system of jurisprudence. Years before John Marshall was born it was a settled doctrine in the Colonies that any legislative act of a colonial legislature must be held void if in conflict with the charter or fundamental law of the Colony. It was a doctrine which grew up with our constitutional history. It was a doctrine which grew up with American law. Over 500 acts of colonial legislatures were held void under this principle.

In the convention which framed the Constitution of the United States it was repeatedly declared that the courts would be bound to hold a statute void when found to be in conflict with the Constitution. In the articles written by Madison and Hamilton, known as the Federalist, urging the adoption of the Constitution and published throughout the States, this power of the courts was explicitly announced. In the conventions in the respective States which ratified the Constitution, particularly in the Virginia convention, this principle was admitted and accepted by both those who opposed ratification and those who supported it. Patrick Henry, opposing ratification, declared the doctrine; and John Marshall, favoring ratification, did likewise; and the contrary view was expressed by no one.

Prior to the time the opinion in Madison against Marbury was rendered, the supreme courts in 9 of the 13 States had declared the doctrine that a statute in contravention to the State constitution must be held void—that is, his was the logic of a written constitution. A number of statutes were held void on this basis by the State courts. Some of these decisions, by reason of the subject matter involved, were noted decisions and generally discussed throughout the States.

Two of these opinions were rendered at the very time the convention which framed the Federal Constitution was in session in Philadelphia. I have searched with some care to find whether any lawyer in any of these cases ever contended that the court did not have such power I find no instance in which this contention was made. It was universally conceded that where an act of the legislature was found to be in conflict with the supreme law, the act must fall; upon no other theory could written constitutions be maintained.

Prior to the opinion in the Madison against Marbury case, Justices Iredell and Patterson, of the Supreme Court of the United States, sitting at circuit, had declared the right and power of the courts to determine the constitutionality of acts of Congress. Chief Justice Jay, in charging a grand jury, had also declared the doctrine. Associate Justice Wilson, one of the truly great jurists of his day, in a law lecture, had announced the principle. Thomas Jefferson, as early as 1785, had declared: "The Judges would consider any law as void which was contrary to the Constitution."

The truth is that the only thing original, or new, in the opinion of Madison against Marbury was the remorseless logic and consummate genius with which Marshall stated the doctrine.

I must not burden this article with long quotations, but may I say Marshall was a Federalist and Chief Justice Taney was a Jacksonian Democrat; but they were in absolute accord on this question. Taney's place in history has suffered by reason of the Dred Scott decision. Nevertheless, in power of intellect, in moral courage, in legal erudition, he must be placed next to Chief Justice Marshall. Fifty years after Marshall's opinion, without any reference to Marshall's opinion or to any precedents, but relying on the terms of the Constitution, and in one of the great opinions of the Court, he said:

"By the very terms of the grant, the Constitution is under their (the Court's) view when any act of Congress is brought before them, and it is their duty to declare it void and refuse to execute it if it is not pursuant to the legislative powers conferred upon Congress."

But, aside from the precedents preceding the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall, had the Court refused or rejected the power to hold a statute in contradiction to the Constitution void, that would have been in direct violation of the plain terms of the Constitution making the Constitution the supreme law of the land, and that would have been the end of a government under a written constitution. If an act of Congress is equal in force and dignity to the Constitution, then the Constitution is not supreme, whereas, if it is supreme, then it is the simple duty of the Court so to declare when a citizen calls upon the Court to determine whether the Constitution or the statute is to prevail.

But the real point is not whether Marshall usurped this power; but did anyone usurp this power? Does the Constitution give power to the Court to declare a law void when in contravention to the Constitution?

This does not seem to me to require any learned argument. The Court cannot of its own initiative declare a law unconstitutional. The Court is powerless to act until the citizen approaches it and says:

"By reason of certain laws passed by Congress, I have been injured, I have been imprisoned, I have had my property taken from me, I have been denied the right to assemble with my neighbors and discuss public questions. Laws passed by Congress deprive me of rights guaranteed to me by the Constitution. I ask the Court to protect my rights under the Constitution. These statutes so gravely affecting my interests seem to me to violate the plain terms of the Constitution. What I want to know is: Am I bound by the statutes or am I protected by the Constitution? I find, according to the Constitution, that this Constitution and the laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land. I contend that these statutes of which I complain were not made in pursuance of the Constitution. I find also that the judicial power extends to all cases in law and equity arising under the Constitution. I am asking for relief, and I invoke the judicial power granted under the Constitution. I want to know why I am made to suffer by an act of Congress which is in violation of the supreme law. This is a legal question which I am presenting to you."

Under the circumstances, what must the Court do? If it refuses to act, it violates its supreme duty. If it does act, it has no choice but to uphold the law that is the supreme law.

If the most unlearned and unskilled person in the land should appear before the Court with such an issue and the most skillful lawyer in the country should appear on the other side, the Court would put aside, as it has often done, the learned arguments and declare that it was bound by the simple terms of the Constitution. I venture to think there is not a person in the United States, Socialist, Communist, anarchist, or what not, but would, if he were denied any constitutional right under some law passed by a State legislature or by the Congress, at once appeal to the courts to declare such law void.

It may be well to remember that this denial of the power of the Court to declare a statute unconstitutional was born of partisan politics. It has never been seriously urged except in heated party conflicts in which the Court refused to bend its opinions to conform to partisian demands. Let us place this doctrine of impotency upon the part of the Court where it belongs, and that is, with blind partisanship. When you destroy the Court's power, you pull down the pillars of the temple.

I do not mean to say the decisions of the Court are above criticism or that the people should not be entirely free to express their views touching the decisions of the Court. But I do mean to say that without the power of the Court to declare acts of Congress in contravention to the Constitution void, the Constitution as the supreme law of the land disappears, and we pass from a constitutional government to a parliamentary government or a dictatorial government, and every right, every privilege, every guaranty of personal liberty which the people have written into the Constitution becomes the plaything of politics and the Court the cowed slaves of partisan dictation.

The Supreme Court is not a divine institution, and its members are not always wholly exempt from the influence of politics. But in my opinion it is the most nearly perfect human institution yet devised by the wit of man for the dispensation of justice and for the preservation of liberty as defined by the people themselves in the charter under which they have declared their desire to live.

So much for the question regarding alleged usurpation by the Court. I am then asked if it is not true that the Court's decisions tend to perpetuate the old local rights of the States unduly, and to the disadvantage of the Nation. The recent decision of the Court in the matter of the National Recovery Act is cited in this connection. The critics of the Court allege that it was blind to modern economic developments. They allege that the decision was a blow to the centralization of governmental authority, which they regard as necessary to the solution of modern national economic problems. They contend accordingly that the Court is "reactionary."

I answer that the Court is in fact not blind to economic developments. But it is bound, in passing upon legal questions, by the terms of the Constitution. It would be an awful situation if this were not true.

I suspect if anyone would propose to create a Supreme Court giving nine men the power to render final decisions on economic problems he would be regarded as more or less a lunatic. If there is found in the Constitution authority which justifies Congress in adopting the scheme, such as the National Recovery Act, the Court upholds the act, however unwise it may be economically. On the other hand, if there is no authority for the enactment of such a law, the Court rejects the law, however wise the proposition might be regarded economically.

If the power is wanting, in other words, and the people favor giving such power to Congress, the people may do so, but not the Court. We amended the Constitution giving power to Congress to levy an income tax after the Court had held that no such power had been granted. In this way the power is always retained by the people. And the Court is bound by the decision of the people as embodied in the Constitution.

Let us never forget that those who talk about the Constitution being antiquated and out of date overlook the fact that the people, if they choose, may bring it down to date, and no one else may do so under our form of government. The contest is really over whether the people shall amend the Constitution, or whether it shall be amended by the Court or by the Congress. The fact is that those who complain that the Court is blind to economic problems seem greatly to hesitate about taking their cause direct to those and those alone who may change the Constitution. They seem to prefer to amend the Constitution by strained and unnatural constructions.

It is true the decisions of the Court have more than once been a blow to so-called centralized government. They have more than once protected State rights. But that is because the Constitution does not provide for centralized government to the extent some desire, and because the Constitution provides for the protection of State rights. Here again, I say, if greater authority is desirable or necessary to the solution of modern economic problems, or if State rights are to be eliminated, ask the people for the power, not the courts. The Constitution should be changed back home, and not in Washington.

Those who complain that the Constitution is inadequate to our modern national needs but who refuse to submit the question to the people in the way of proposed amendments, either discredit their own sincerity or pay high tribute to the intelligence and judgment of the people.

Passing from this immediate topic of State rights, I am asked to express myself further on constitutional amendments in general. I am asked to remember that I myself was associated with the adoption of the amendment which clothed the Federal Government with the power to levy income taxes. I am asked to state my view of the amendment process.

I think that the question of amendments and the method of adopting amendments are always important, but particularly so just now. There seem to be those who would have no amendment or amendments. And there seem to be those would would amend the Constitution more or less as you would amend an appropriation bill, and with about the same object in view.

I feel we ought not to be afraid to consider amendments, but we ought to be exceedingly considerate and deliberate in adopting amendments. Changes may be necessary. The framers of the Constitution understood that perfectly. But to change the character of the charter of government is the most vital exertion of political power in which a people can engage, and that fact we ought never to overlook. I think we should follow the rule which Puck once announced as the rule of President Cleveland: "Be sure you are right; then stop a little."

The amendment process is said to be a slow process. But, in my judgment, it is not too slow. There can hardly be too much debate and deliberation and reflection on the matter of amendments to the Constitution. The fourteenth amendment has some provisions in it which are wise enough, and some which ought never to have been placed in the Constitution. The manner in which it was forced through few men would want to see repeated under any circumstances. The test in considering amendments is to secure consideration under the most favorable circumstances and, insofar as practicable, free from partisan domination.

We sometime still hear it said that those who wrote the Constitution did not trust the people. But no greater trust could be reposed in the people than to give them the power peacefully to change their form of government. It was an expression of confidence in the judgment, patriotism, and statesmanship of the average man and woman. At the time the Constitution was written the world at large regarded such bestowal of power upon the people as incredible demagoguery. The fact that the framers of the Constitution threw safeguards about the power to amend, so as to insure deliberation and general approval, detracts not at all from the almost sublime confidence which the makers of the Constitution reposed in the people. At that time governments were neither made nor changed by the people.

It is nevertheless asserted that the makers of the Constitution designed it to be in its central essence a mere bulwark of property. It is asserted that the central function of the Court is the maintenance of undue and excessive outworn property rights. It is asserted that the Court sustains those so-called property rights against so-called human rights. I am asked what I think about that charge.

Well, I have never been able to understand it.

I am quite aware that some writers have dilated on the theory that our Constitution was framed and adopted with the view of protecting property rights at the expense of human rights. But neither the document, nor the decisions of the Court, nor the historic facts surrounding the adoption of the Constitution seem to me to support this charge.

Tell me, if you will, where you will find a document of government so right in human rights as the Constitution of the United States? It is true that technically the Bill of Rights was not a part of the Constitution when it was formally submitted. But it is also true that, in the contemplation of all, the Bill of Rights was a part of the Constitution at the beginning.

Think of adopting a charter of government in 1789 which guaranteed religious liberty, free speech, a free press, and all those rights and privileges guaranteed and protected in the Constitution. No such rights upon the part of the people existed to any extent at that time in the entire world. It seemed like madness to other governments, and they made no concealment of their derision. The human rights specified and preserved in the Constitution are the fundamental human rights; and, these rights being guaranteed, all human rights are made secure.

Look at the world today and reflect upon what a small portion of the globe now sees the people enjoying free speech, free press, religious liberty, the right of trial by jury, personal liberty. No! No! It is not true that human rights are submerged by the Constitution. If we live up to our Constitution in letter and in spirit, human rights will always be supreme.

And what are these property rights which are guaranteed and made safe by the Constitution? What an inseparable part are they of human rights!

Is not the right to acquire, own, and enjoy property a part of human rights? Is there any such thing as personal liberty without it? There is a very large portion of the human family at this time who will tell you that liberty, family happiness, and contentment were all lost in the selfsame hour that they lost the right to acquire property and to be secure in its enjoyment. The framers were wise enough to know and brave enough to declare that when you have made property rights secure you have contributed incalculably to human rights and to human liberty.

But it is asked: "How has the Supreme Court protected these rights? Has it turned its back upon personal liberty, free speech, free press, religious liberty, jury trial, and so forth?" I can pick out decisions, and doubtless others can, which seem to justify criticism. But an institution has a right to be judged by its record as a whole. And taken as a whole, there is no finer record in protecting human rights than that recorded in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

There have been occasions when the political side of the Government felt justified in invading some of these human rights. The Supreme Court has invariably struck down the laws which took away or compromised these rights. It has protected the right of trial by jury. It has protected religious liberty. It has protected personal liberty. And it has done so in some instances under the most trying and adverse circumstances.

You will recall that, in the midst of the excitement of the so-called Burr conspiracy men were seized without warrant, transported hundreds of miles, and thrown into prison and denied trial. The Court protected them in their rights when they were able to reach the Court.

When President Lincoln suspended the writ of habeas corpus Chief Justice Taney unhesitatingly declared that act was in violation of the Constitution and imperiled the liberty of all citizens. No finer exhibition of judicial courage is to be found in the history of jurisprudence than that of the venerable Chief Justice bending under the furious assault of war passion, but courageously upholding what he believed to be the plain provisions of the Constitution. And now that the passion of the hour has subsided, few men will be found to question the soundness or the importance of Taney's views.

When Congress, under a plea of emergency, subjected the citizen to trial by court martial, the Court struck down the law. Without great detail and without mentioning a multitude of decisions, I know of no instance wherein the liberty of the citizens imperiled by legislation or the act of the Executive in times of stress or in times of passion has not been upheld and protected by the Supreme Court.

All through our history there have been efforts from time to time to make it appear that the Supreme Court of the United States is far removed from the people; but history, speaking the truth, relates a different story. Whether it has been an ignorant and condemned Negro charged with the most heinous of crimes, or the combined prestige of Congress and the Executive exerting powers beyond the terms of the Constitution, the Court has been the tribunal to which the citizen in the last appeal has gone for that protection given him by the terms of the Constitution. And rarely indeed can anyone say that his constitutional rights have been denied him. While no one would claim for any human tribunal exemption from human error, does not the record disclose, and does not candor compel us to say, that with remarkable fidelity, wisdom, and justice human rights have been at all times safeguarded and preserved as those rights are to be found in the law of the land?

It is now suggested, and from a most respectable source, that the Supreme Court be made an advisory body on constitutional questions. It is suggested that the Court advise Congress during the process of legislation. The idea is that some plan should be provided whereby the Court may pass upon the constitutionality of proposed measures of legislation.

I think that a little reflection will convince anyone that this would destroy entirely the highest virtue of the Court. That virtue is that there should be a tribunal unbiased and uncommitted to which the citizen may repair when he feels his constitutional rights have been invaded.

Let us suppose that a law has been passed, and that during the process of legislation the Court had declared the law to be constitutional. After it becomes a law a private citizen believes it to be unconstitutional and alleges that it has deprived him of his constitutional right. Where is the unbiased, uncommitted tribunal to which he can take his cause and present his argument?

If he takes it to a court which has already passed upon the law, his case is prejudged before he has ever been heard. He would be placed in the position of calling upon the court to reverse its opinion. Anything or any scheme which embarrasses the court in giving a free, full, unbiased, uncommitted consideration to the claim of the private citizen strikes at the very foundation of the court's dignity and worth.

I am now finally asked how I view the Court in the light of the world-wide struggle between democracy and dictatorship. I am reminded that some of the most earnest advocates of democracy in this country are equally earnest, apparently, in demanding an abridgment or even an abrogation of the power of the Court. I am asked my attitude toward this conflict of opinion. I can state it perfectly explicitly:

It is my feeling that, when the framers of the Constitution lodged the power to amend the Constitution in the people, and conferred upon the Supreme Court the power to annul acts found to be in violation of the Constitution, they made this a government of law rather than a government of men. And only by preserving both the Constitution and the power of the Court can we be certain that it will remain a government of law.

When Septimus Severus was dying he said to his successor, "Pay the soldiers, and don't worry about anything else." His idea apparently was that so long as the soldiers were not disaffected the government would stand. One might almost say, "So far as communism or fascism are concerned, preserve the Constitution with its free speech, free press, right of assemblage, and the other guaranties, and don't worry about anything else."

As I see it, the combat between communism and fascism on the one hand, and democracy on the other, in the last analysis, comes down to the simple question: What, if any, place shall be given to the average man and woman in government? What voice shall they have? Both communism and fascism would rob them of every right, every privilege, every guaranty given them in our Constitution—personal liberty, and all the attributes of liberty. The first line of defense therefore against a dictatorial government is the Constitution of the United States.

People do not voluntarily surrender their liberty, once they have enjoyed it. Thomas Jefferson said, you will recall:

"Where every man is a sharer in the direction of his ward republic or some of the higher ones, and feels that he is a participator in the government of affairs, not merely at an election one day in the year but every day, he will let the heart be torn out of his body sooner than his power wrested from him by a Caesar or a Bonaparte."

Men may be cheated out of it, misled and deceived into surrendering their liberty, or they may be subjugated by force. But they do not surrender these things voluntarily. If the guaranties of the Constitution of the United States remain intact, if the Court remains intact, there is little chance indeed for arbitrary government for any considerable length of time, especially.

To put it another way, the only sure cure for communism or fascism is Americanism. I use that term, not as we use it on the Fourth of July or on state occasions, but as an expression of the doctrine of individual liberty.

It does not seem to me that there is nearly so much danger to our institutions in the out-and-out advocates of communism or fascism as there is in our tendency to praise the principles of democracy but employ the methods of fascism. In the way of illustration, I read in a current magazine the words of an important official, which are as follows:

"Certain conclusions appear clear. In the first place it seems clear that in these difficult times we need centralization of leadership. Decentralization of leadership may be a good thing for local matters, but what can it avail in our national affairs? If such leadership is an important requirement, from what source can it be obtained? Can it come from 435 Congressmen and the 96 Senators? Can it come from nine Justices of the Supreme Court? It would appear that the Chief Executive is the only source from which national leadership may be sought with any hope of effective results."

Mussolini never stated the doctrine of fascism with greater boldness or greater clarity than it is here stated. "Centralization of leadership." We have a practical and impressive illustration of that now. Mussolini, having silenced the voice of the people, having reduced to pitiable impotency the representatives of the people, having disregarded the Constitution, and having made subservient the judges so that no citizen can appeal to the courts for justice, according to the Constitution, leads his people according to the discretion and judgment of "centralization of leadership." There you have speedy action, quick decision, undivided responsibility, with no power of appeal to the courts or to the Constitution, and no right of discussion.

Here in this official's statement is an unmistakable contention that courts and constitutions and Members of the Congress elected by the people are an impediment. Then follows, although it is not mentioned, what must inevitably follow, that free speech and a free press and the right of assemblage, would be an impediment to "centralized leadership."

Individual leadership has its place, but there is a higher leadership to which all individual leadership must be subordinated, and that is the leadership which comes from the combined heart and brain and from the conscience and the soul of millions of intelligent and patriotic people. That is a leadership less amenable to the call of ambition, less likely to suffer from the corroding effect of power, and more likely to take into consideration the welfare of all.

When you remove the restraints of popular judgment you not only have taken the first step but you have taken the last step toward absolute dictatorial power; I do not care what you call it.

We hear constantly about these "difficult times" as an argument in favor of wiping out all the rights and guaranties given the people under the Constitution. It was in difficult times, very difficult times, times which tried men's souls, that the Constitution was written, and "centralization of leadership" was for all times rejected. It was in difficult times, when economic and financial chaos reigned, that Washington calmly rejected the proffered centralization of leadership. It was in difficult times, very difficult times, a time when we were torn with civil strife, that the Great Martyr declared that the Government of the people must not perish.

They had faith in our form of government, and difficult as the times were, they did not indulge in the defeatist policy of surrendering the vital principles upon which a free government rests. A little patience, a little courage, a little faith, will stimulate tremendously one's confidence in the efficiency and the permanency of constitutional government.

THE AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONAL METHOD—ADDRESS BY ATTORNEY GENERAL CUMMINGS

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, on December 18 last the Attorney General of the United States delivered a very able address before the Association of the Bar of the City of New York on "The American Constitutional Method." I ask unanimous consent that the address be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In the 147 years which have elapsed since its adoption the Constitution of the United States has probably been the subject of more controversy than any other great document in human history.

The framers of the Virginia-Kentucky resolutions of 1798 took one view of its meaning, the Federalists another. The friends of the Bank of the United States thought that the Constitution conferred powers on the Federal Government which the opponents of the bank, with equal earnestness, denied. The South Carolina nullifiers of 1833 believed that a protective tariff was unconstitutional, while Judge Story and Daniel Webster were firm in the opposite belief. After the close of the Civil War the so-called radicals thought that the new amendments conferred on the Congress power to protect civil rights within the several States, while their opponents gave to the amendments a narrower construction, which was afterward confirmed by the Supreme Court.

And yet, in the face of this series of examples, which might be multiplied almost indefinitely, there is nothing more characteristic of constitutional controversy than the recurrent assumption on the part of the disputants that their own construction alone has a sole and exclusive title to correctness, and that whoever challenges that construction, or argues against it, is guilty of no lighter offense than that of laying impious hands on the Ark of the Covenant. This attitude is, perhaps, a natural consequence of man's insatiable desire for certainty, which he seeks to satisfy by convincing himself that he already has certainty in his grasp. This tends to increase the heat, as well as the scope, of the debate. Men are apt to become irritated when they find their own certainties disputed, and to that extent shaken, by the existence of other and inconsistent certainties on the part of other men. But, as Mr. Justice Holmes admonishes us, "Certainly, generally, is an illusion and repose is not the destiny of man"; and it was George Meredith who, referring to this human frailty, exclaimed:

> "Ah, what a dusty answer gets the soul
> When hot for certainties in this our life."

The Constitution is a fundamental document, expressed for the most part in general principles, and couching its precepts in language designed to make possible the attainment of the great ends of government.

Mr. Justice Story, in delivering the opinion of the Court in Martin v. Hunter (1 Wheat. 326), said:

"The Constitution unavoidably deals in general language. It did not suit the purposes of the people, in framing this great charter of our liberties, to provide for minute specifications of its powers, or to declare the means by which those powers should be carried into execution. It was foreseen that this would be perilous and difficult, if not an impracticable task. The instrument was not intended to provide merely for the exigencies of a few years but was to endure through a long lapse of ages, the events of which were locked up in the inscrutable purposes of Providence. It could not be foreseen what new changes and modifications of power might be indispensable to effectuate the general objects of the charter; and restrictions and specifications, which, at the present, might seem salutary, might, in the end, prove the overthrow of the system itself. Hence, its powers are expressed in general terms, leaving to the legislature, from time to time, to adopt its own means to effectuate legitimate objects, and to mold and model the exercise of its powers, as its own wisdom, and the public interests should require."

A similar thought was expressed by Chief Justice Marshall in McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat. 407).

The result of the process of constitutional construction depends on the relative weight given to this or that factor in a chain of inference. One mind will be impressed by the need of centralized power, another by the value of local self-government; one by immediate governmental necessities, another by the danger of governmental abuses; one by the rights of property, another by the claims of human sympathy; one by the sanctity of contracts, another by the requirements of essential justice. The interplay of these conflicting concepts, and the predominance of one or another at different periods of national development, are illustrated throughout the long history of judicial decisions and should serve to convince us that within the great house of the Constitution are many mansions, and that the questions which are left open within its four corners are frequently susceptible of more than one solution based upon reason.

The Supreme Court does not operate in a legalistic vacuum of abstract propositions. On the contrary, it is part and parcel of an organic process of government which comprises the constitution-making process, the legislative process, and all the other processes through which, in a government resting on popular sovereignty, public opinion is enabled to register itself in governmental acts. Moreover, the cases which come before the Supreme Court are, for the most part, presented by the exigencies of litigation, not cases selected to round out the symmetry of a theory. Such cases are created by the accidents, or the pressures, or the changing ideals, of national life. In this welter of fact and circumstance there is a place for logic and the Court has applied it; but there is a place, too, for that "inarticulate premise" to which Mr. Justice Holmes referred when he deprecated "a system of delusive exactness."

Shifting national needs and maturing national ideals have at times resulted in reversals of previous decisions. At the outset the Supreme Court held that the admiralty powers of the Constitution extended only to navigable waters within the ebb and flow of the tide. This ruling excluded, of course, the Great Lakes; and it was reversed in 1852 in the leading case of The Propeller Genessee Chief (12 How. 443). Referring to the earlier decisions, Chief Justice Taney said:

"The conviction that this definition of admiralty powers was narrower than the Constitution contemplated has been growing stronger every day with the growing commerce on the Lakes and navigable rivers of the Western States."

It was, perhaps, natural for the courts of the United States, in an early period, to adopt the limited definition; for until the invention of the steamboat there could be nothing like extended navigation upon waters with an unchanging current resisting the upward passage; but the Chief Justice went on to point out that at the time of such decisions "the commerce on the rivers of the West and on the Lakes was in its infancy and of little importance, and but little regarded, compared with the present day."

Another instance in which the Court, during the same period of its history, reversed its previous holding has to do with the question of whether foreign corporations have a right of access to the Federal courts under the diversity of citizenship provision of the judiciary article of the Constitution. The original rule laid down by Marshall in Bank of United States v. Devereaux (5 Cr. 61) was that a foreign corporation had no such right unless all its stockholders were citizens of a State other than that of the opposing party in the suit. This decision was reversed in 1844 in Louisville, etc., R. R. v. Letson (2 How. 497), which held that, for the purpose of a suit in a Federal court, a corporation must be presumed to be a citizen of the State in which it was incorporated. The Court said, in its opinion, that the old cases "had never been satisfactory to the bar" nor "entirely satisfactory to the Court that made them." The vast growth and extension of the corporate method of doing business had obviously produced its effect on the judicial mind.

Instances in quite recent years of definite reversals by the Court of important decisions in the field of taxation come readily to mind, notably Blackstone v. Miller (188 U. S. 189), overruled in Farmers Loan Co. v. Minnesota (280 U. S. 204–209), and Long v. Rockwood (277 U. S. 142), overruled in Fox Film Corporation v. Doyal (286 U. S. 123).

The history of the Court is not free from examples of reversals or substantial modifications of its position in cases involving issues of far wider public interest and more general controversy than those which I have mentioned. An outstanding illustration was the important modification of the doctrine of the Dartmouth College case, after a change in the personnel of the Court, by the Charles River Bridge case. The Dartmouth College case had held that a corporate charter was an inviolable grant which could not constitutionally be impaired by subsequent legislation. The question raised in the Charles River Bridge case was whether the constitutional guarantee extended beyond the express terms of the grant to the implications of exclusiveness to which it owed, in large measure at least, its financial value. When the case was first argued in 1831, while Marshall was still Chief Justice, the Court apparently had no doubt that the guaranty did cover such implications. When the case was finally decided 6 years later, however, the ruling was to the opposite effect, over a strong dissent from Judge Story. It was in this case that Chief Justice Taney voiced the memorable sentiment:

"While the rights of private property are sacredly guarded, we must not forget that the community also have rights and that the happiness and well-being of every citizen depends on their faithful preservation" (Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet. 420 at 548).

It was this decision which called forth from Judge Story the gloomy remark that "the old constitutional doctrines are fast fading away and a change has come over the public mind from which I augur little good" (Warren's History of the Supreme Court, vol. 2, p. 302). In his dissenting opinion he said that the very raising of the contentions which had received the support of the majority of the Court was "sufficient to alarm every stockholder in every public enterprise of this sort throughout the whole country." Daniel Webster complained that "the decision has completely overturned a clear provision of the Constitution" and reported that "Judge Story thinks the Supreme Court is gone, and I think so, too, and almost everything else is gone, or seems rapidly going." Chancellor Kent wrote that he had reperused the Charles River Bridge decision with increased disgust, and that "It abandons or overthrows a great principle of constitutional morality. * * * It injures the moral sense of the community and destroys the sanctity of contracts."

Yet, within 15 years a later judge, who was himself no ineffective defender of property rights, speaking of this decision, was able to say: "No opinion of the Court has more fully satisfied the legal judgment of the country, and consequently none has exercised more influence upon its legislation" (Campbell, J., in State v. Knopp, 16 How. 409).

A more recent instance in which the Supreme Court, on an issue of great public importance, originally took a position from which it was later to recede is afforded by the famous E. C. Knight case (156 U. S. 1 (1895)), the first to come before that tribunal under the Sherman Antitrust Act. It was held that a monopolistic combination of manufacturers could not be constitutionally reached by the antitrust laws, since manufacture was not commerce, and therefore was exempt from control by the Congress. The decision, while it stood, effectively paralyzed the operation of the antitrust laws for a number of years and drew sharp criticism from many commentators. One of them, writing in the American Law Review in the year when the decision was handed down, said that "the Sugar Trust decision and the income-tax decision"—rendered the same year—"counterbalance all the good the Court has done in 70 years and inflict a wound on the rights of the American people." Within a few years, however, the Court reconsidered its position and held that while the Sherman Act might affect local conditions it could nevertheless be constitutionally applied even to transactions local in character if they operated to effect a restraint on interstate commerce (Northern Securities Co. v. United States, 193 U. S. 197 (1904)). This decision revitalized the antitrust laws and rendered them once more serviceable.

The outstanding instance in which the Supreme Court has reversed itself was when, in the Legal Tender Cases (12 Wall. 457 (1871)), it overruled its prior decision in Hepburn v. Griswold (8 Wall. 603 (1870)). The Hepburn case, which was decided by a vote of 4 to 3, represented a recognition, in the minds of a majority of the Court, of a body of economic doctrines resulting from the contact of certain economists with the bullion question as it had presented itself in England at the close of the Napoleonic wars. The economic soundness or unsoundness of these doctrines was, no doubt, a question of importance for legislative consideration. To read them, however, into constitutional requirements, as the majority of the Court did, imposed an unwarranted limitation upon an essential power of sovereignty. The decision met with some favor on economic grounds, but even its supporters referred to "the impropriety of taking from Congress and committing to a court of justice a task so plainly legislative in its nature."

The New York Times stated that "the effect of the decision if allowed to stand strips the Nation of one of its means of warfare and defense."

The doctrines of the Legal Tender cases were reaffirmed, in the broadest terms, 12 years later in Julliard v. Greenman (110 U. S. 421) with but one dissent, and in the recent Gold Clause cases they have been extended still further. In numerous instances, without overruling particular decisions, the Court has shifted its emphasis from one class of guiding considerations to another. The trends which lawyers attempt to deduce therefrom are, of course, of the utmost importance in determining the law for future cases and in advising clients in pending matters.

Nevertheless, the history of the decisions indicates that few such trends have been sufficiently continuous to supply a basis of certainty as to their indefinite projection into the future. On the contrary, there has been, naturally and properly, an ebb and flow, with a conspicuous lack of basis for assurance as to when the ebb will cease and the flow set in.

Outstanding examples are to be found in the construction of the commerce clause from Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat. 1) to Leisy v. Hardin (135 U. S. 100), and the course of decisions in cases of legislative price fixing from Munn v. Illinois (94 U. S. 113) to Nebbia v. New York (291 U. S. 502). In Gibbons v. Ogden the Court had plainly indicated its view that the Federal power to regulate interstate commerce is exclusive, with the result that all regulation of such commerce by the States is invalid. In the License Cases (5 How. 504), however, the Court upheld a State regulation of liquor imported from other States. A satisfactory line of demarcation between State and Federal police regulations seemed ultimately established by Cooley v. The Port Wardens (12 How. 299), but this line was again unsettled by Leisy v. Hardin, supra, which once more cast doubt on the validity of State regulations affecting articles moving in interstate commerce.

The relations of legislative price fixing to the due-process clause seemed settled on the basis of public interest from the time of the Munn case in 1876 to German Alliance Ins. Co. v. Kansas (233 U. S. 389) in 1914, but there followed in the 1920's a series of cases like the Employment Agency case (Ribnick v. McBride, 277 U. S. 350) and the Theater Ticket case (Tyson v. Banton, 273 U. S. 418), which seemed to stand for some narrower doctrine until the authority of the earlier decisions was reestablished and extended 2 years ago in the Nebbia case.

Shifts in the trend of the Supreme Court's opinions have been noted by the great commentator on American institutions, James (afterward Lord) Bryce. He says:

"The Supreme Court has changed its color, i. e., its temper and tendencies, from time to time according to the political proclivities of the men who composed it. * * * Their action flowed naturally from the habits of thought they had formed before their accession to the bench and from the sympathy they could not but feel for the doctrines on whose behalf they had contended." (American Commonwealth, 3d ed., vol. 1, pp. 274–275.)

And again:

"The Supreme Court feels the touch of public opinion. Opinion is stronger in America than anywhere else in the world, and judges are only men. To yield a little may be prudent, for the tree that cannot bend to the blast may be broken. There is, moreover, this ground at least for presuming public opinion to be right, that through it the progressive judgment of the world is expressed." (Ibid., p. 273.)

In view of the close and inevitable connection which thus exists between the questions which the Court has to decide and the great issues which agitate public opinion, it is not unnatural that the decisions and doctrines of the Court should be the subject of widespread public interest. The Constitution is supreme simply because it expresses the ultimate will of the people. The people are, accordingly, the masters of the Constitution, and their mastery is expressed in the power of amendment, which, it must not be forgotten, is as much a part of the Constitution as any other provision. This power has been exerted three times in our history for the deliberate purpose of overriding a previous decision of the Supreme Court.

The first instance occurred at the very commencement of our Government, when the eleventh amendment, prohibiting suits by private parties against a State, was adopted to undo the effect of the decision of the Supreme Court in Chisholm v. Georgia (2 Dallas 419). The latest instance was the adoption of the sixteenth amendment to make a Federal income tax possible over the decision of the Supreme Court in Pollock v. Farmers Loan & Trust Co. (158 U. S. 601). The other instance was the adoption of the thirteenth amendment to undo the effect of the Dred Scott decision (19 How. 393).

In discussions of our constitutional system there is no occasion to hurry over the Dred Scott decision with averted gaze. It holds a lesson for us. Newspapers of the time spoke of the decision as "exerting the most powerful and salutary influence throughout the United States", as "a closing and clinching confirmation of the settlement of the [slavery] issue", and as exerting "a mighty influence in diffusing sound opinions and restoring harmony and fraternal concord throughout the country." In connection with no other opinion was there ever a greater effort on the part of those who agreed with it to misrepresent all public expressions of disagreement as blows aimed at the judiciary. And yet, as we look back upon that controversy, we cannot doubt that the discussion was salutary, nor can we help feeling that the sound American attitude was that expressed by Abraham Lincoln when he said:

"But we think the Dred Scott decision is erroneous. We know the court that made it has often overruled its own decisions, and we shall do what we can to have it overrule this." (Speech at Springfield, Ill., June 26, 1857.)

And, again, in his first inaugural:

"The candid citizen must confess that if the policy of the Government upon vital questions affecting the whole people is to be irrevocably fixed by decisions of the Supreme Court, the instant they are made in ordinary litigation between parties in personal actions, the people would have ceased to be their own ruler, having to that extent practically resigned their Government into the hands of that eminent tribunal."

In a time of constitutional discussion like the present, when once again, as in so many preceding periods, clashing interests and conflicting ideals are pressing for expression in governmental action, and seeking to clothe themselves with the mantle of constitutional sanction while fixing the stigma of unconstitutionality on their opponents, it is well for us, as lawyers, to resort to the steadying influence of the historic view. Such consideration should shield us from ill-considered conclusions on at least two questions which, for the moment, seem to be creating much confusion of thought in both professional and lay minds.

The first of these has to do with the propriety of public criticism of the decisions of the courts on constitutional questions.

It seems clear, from the fragments of history to which I have adverted, that such discussion has gone on from the beginning of our Government, and has repeatedly affected the character of judicial decisions or has expressed itself in the form of constitutional amendments. Of course, the fact that such criticism has occurred and has produced results is of itself no justification of its propriety. If the Constitution imposes in all instances a clear and specific mandate upon the judges, leaving them no discretion and no room within which reasonable men may differ, then obviously any criticism of decisions so compelled would be grossly misdirected. What I have said should sufficiently indicate, however, that on many great constitutional issues decisions are not thus inexorably required by the Constitution. They proceed rather from a chain of inference and intermediate reasoning, the result of which depends upon the relative weight which one mind or another may give to a variety of competing considerations. If, as Bryce has pointed out in the passage I have read, these considerations are in part drawn, not from the mere private preferences of the Judges as individuals, but rather from the impressions produced on their minds by the general public sense of what is just and what is necessary in the public interest, then such public discussion, so far from being unfair to the Judges and a hindrance to the performance of their duties, is, on the contrary, an important and valid aid in acquainting them with some of the weighty factors which properly enter into the process of decision.

The second question is whether the legislative branch of the Government and the Executive, in view of their oath to support the Constitution, may rightfully take any action or join in the enactment of any law the constitutionality of which is doubtful. It has been argued that should the Executive or a Member of the Congress have serious doubt whether a proposed enactment is constitutional, he would violate his oath of office by assenting to it or voting for it.

This argument rests on a misunderstanding as to the form and nature of the Constitution and as to the function of the Supreme Court with reference thereto. If we are aware, as all students of the Constitution must be, of the sweeping language in which its provisions are couched, and of the variety of considerations to which the Supreme Court must give weight, it seems clear that practically no new legislation of a controversial character can ever be said to be free from constitutional question. Indeed, the only legislation as to which no doubt can exist is an enactment substantially identical with some previous statute already approved by the Supreme Court, and even here there is the possibility of error in view of the fact that the Court has frequently reversed itself. The theory that any Member of Congress violates his oath who votes in favor of legislation not free from constitutional doubt would entirely exclude the possibility of legislation in new fields or of novel character.

As heretofore indicated, constitutional objections have been raised as to nearly every important piece of legislation enacted since the beginning of the Government. The constitutionality of a protective tariff was questioned when the first tariff act was proposed and was bitterly debated for many years; the constitutionality of national banks was contested; the constitutionality of Federal expenditures for internal improvements, roads, canals, and railways was vigorously assailed; the constitutionality of the Interstate Commerce Act was the subject of long discussion; and the constitutionality of the acts establishing the Department of the Interior and the Department of Agriculture was vehemently denied. Speaking of the bill to establish the Interior Department, John C. Calhoun said:

"This monstrous bill will turn over the whole interior affairs of the Government to this Department and it is one of the greatest steps ever made to absorb all the remaining powers of the State."

Certainly no one, however, who is familiar with our history, and assuredly no lawyer, would undertake to argue that, because the Court ultimately determined that a particular enactment was constitutional, there was no reasonable ground for doubt at the outset. President Taft, for example, vetoed the Webb-Kenyon Act on the ground that his oath of office did not permit him to give his assent to an act of doubtful constitutionality. In fact, he went rather far in admonishing the Congress as to its duty in the premises. The act, however, was passed over his veto, and in due course the Supreme Court pronounced it constitutional (Clark Distilling Co. v. Western Maryland Ry., 242 U. S. 311).

The doctrine expressed by President Taft would, if applied, require that doubts be resolved by the Congress adversely to constitutionality, thereby bringing many essential processes of the Government to a standstill. If no act of the Congress of doubtful constitutionality were ever passed, the Supreme Court would have little or no occasion to exercise any function in the matter of constitutional interpretation.

The correct course would seem to be that the Executive and the members of the legislative branch, when not clearly convinced of the unconstitutionality of a measure otherwise desirable, should not necessarily regard themselves as thereby deterred from enacting it, but should consider the advisability of leaving the doubt to be determined where it can be determined authoritatively, namely, by the Supreme Court. This was the position of Senator Fessenden, of Maine, in the debate on the Legal Tender Acts when he said:

"I have not touched the constitutional question. * * * We may well leave that question to be settled by the courts and not attempt to settle it ourselves" (57 Cong. Globe, 767).

It was, also, the position of Madison during the first Congress when called upon to vote on the bill for the encouragement of the cod fisheries. Madison felt that the bill was unconstitutional in certain respects, and favored an amendment to eliminate such provisions. The amendment failed, and it is interesting to note that notwithstanding his conscientious view that the bill was in the main probably unconstitutional, he nevertheless voted for it on its final passage. As has been heretofore noted, Lincoln was not prepared, in certain instances at least, to let such a question rest, even after the Supreme Court had spoken.

Of late, however, we have been confronted with the further assumption that a correct understanding of the meaning of the Constitution is revealed not merely to the Supreme Court but to certain individuals who, from time to time, deplore the course of events and express an exaggerated anxiety as to the safety of our institutions. The precise meaning of the Constitution becomes, therefore, the particular meaning which they, as an esoteric group of specially endowed individuals, have elicited by their own efforts and their own processes of inference from the previous decisions of the courts. This would seem to present a somewhat novel phenomenon in the matter of constitutional interpretation. It may well be asked, however, what intellectual, professional, or political right has any individual, or any group of individuals, thus to proclaim in advance, and as if from on high, a constitutional interpretation which can be authoritatively supplied only by the Supreme Court itself, which has so frequently confounded by its decisions, the forecasts and opinions of Congresses and Presidents, as well as of private critics and commentators?

The absolute theory of one and only one rational construction of the Constitution renders impossible any proper understanding of the nature of our American constitutional method and of the functions of our Supreme Court.

With us the people have established a Constitution which is supreme over all the acts of government—legislative, executive, and judicial alike—because it is the highest expression of the popular will. Of necessity, it employs broad language which leaves a wide area for legitimate differences of opinion. Within this arena of debate all voices must be heard. The courts may give, and as a rule do give, less weight to what they feel to be temporary currents of opinion, casual pressures for reform, evanescent aspirations, or momentary ideals, as contrasted with what they may properly regard as the confirmed and enlightened sense of justice developed by the changing life of a vital and growing nation.

If the courts prove mistaken in their reading of this ultimate will, or if the Constitution itself in some clearly expressed provision no longer conforms thereto, then, by its very terms the people are guaranteed the right to make their desires effective through the solemn process of amendment.

Our Government is not a documentary, a political, or a judicial absolutism. The American constitutional method is a process of adaptation and growth, as well as a means whereby wrongs may be corrected and governmental measures may be attuned to the essentials of justice, through the orderly ways of discussion and education, as opposed to the violent changes and intolerable tyrannies by which absolute governments are inevitably characterized. Were this not true the Constitution would be a dam against which the waters of life would beat in vain, rather than a directing channel through which the stream of national existence may safely pass.

WILL ROGERS

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a tribute to Will Rogers by Gene Buck, who was his first employer and who represents the opinion of 125,000,000 people in the United States.

There being no objection, the tribute was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WILL ROGERS—HUMAN BEING

By Gene Buck

Someone has said, "When we lose a friend we die a little." That is a simple, powerful truth.

When we lost Will Rogers we all lost a friend, and this Nation "died a little."

You can search this land of ours from the prairies to the skyscrapers, from the crossroads to the White House, from the strawberry festivals to the mightiest radio hook-up, from the little red schoolhouse to the greatest university, from the country editor to the outstanding newspaper syndicate, and you cannot find a single soul to replace him.

There was only one Will Rogers and he contributed to this Nation something that is needed most that we cannot develop, manufacture, or imitate—genuine humor—that rare gift to make us smile and laugh and temporarily forget what we ought to forget.

He possessed the genius to write and to say out loud what most of us thought, but didn't dare say, about people, affairs, and conditions. With his grand sense of humor he possessed a great mind with an uncanny knowledge of human beings and their motives. He was wise to the pomp and the didos, the bunk and the real, and had overwhelming understanding of the common people because he was one of them himself and he never forgot it even when fame smeared him with its brush.

I have dined with him, at his side, with stage hands, scrubwomen, and dressers on the stage of an empty theater after the show, to a state dinner to the President, the Vice President, the Cabinet, and their wives. He was always the same—his manners, his mood, his clothes, and his precious gift of humor and observation.

He enjoyed a position never before attained by anyone I ever heard of. He could go any place, see anything, talk or write about it afterward, and in such a way that the humble and the great accepted it and loved him for it.

It was my privilege to be close to him for over 20 years. I saw him in all kinds of spots—from the sanctity of his home which was always simple, wholesome, modest, and plain, to the glittering, glamorous applause and laughter of thousands. I have ridden alongside of him in his model T Ford with his overalls and cowboy boots, and have sat with him in a modern transcontinental airplane. He was always the same.

Will really loved to fly, and he loved Wiley Post as a flyer and as a friend. He thought Wiley was the greatest pilot in the world, and most aviators that he knew—and Bill knew most of them—agreed with him.

I personally believe that if Bill had the choice of his "exit", as we say in the theater, in "heading for the last round-up", he would have chosen the one that took him from us all.

In speaking and thinking of Bill, now, my thoughts naturally drift to Betty, his devoted, self-effacing, lovely wife. This whole world will never know what she meant to him and his extraordinary career. I happen to know. I have never known of a more beautiful or happier mating in my lifetime.

I realize, while giving expression to these thoughts, that in writing my style lacks the force of Hemingway and the clarity of Hearst. Possibly I have used too many adjectives. If I have, Bill deserved them all. These lines are from the heart.

Mere words are unable to adequately estimate what the Oklahoma cowpuncher-philosopher meant to this Nation.

No human being, in our time, is more deserving of a memorial, and his countless friends and admirers consider it a privilege to perpetuate what he stood for and contributed to make this Nation a better place to live in—humor, common sense, and charity.

So long, Bill! God rest your great and kindly soul!

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE HENRY M. KIMBALL

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The resolutions (H. Res. 379) were read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
January 3, 1936.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. HENRY M. KIMBALL, a Representative from the State of Michigan.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk and ask for their present consideration.

The resolutions (S. Res. 215) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. HENRY M. KIMBALL, late a Representative from the State of Michigan.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, JANUARY 6, 1936

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, we rejoice that the divine love is as enduring as the throne of the Infinite God. As Thou art the God of the whole earth, we humble ourselves before Thee and gratefully acknowledge Thy merciful providences. We pray that our affections and loyalties may swing unstintedly to Thee and lead us through cares, responsibilities, and perplexities to heights unscaled and depths unplumbed. Let triumphant faith run through the arteries of our national life and work with Thee for the coming of a more complete vision of righteousness, holiness, and peace. Thus we shall fulfill the highest hopes for civilization and become the teacher of all nations in free and Christian institutions. These blessings we ask through Christ, our Redeemer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, January 3, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow and deep regret the announcement of the death of Hon. HUEY P. LONG, late a Senator from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate at the conclusion of its proceedings today adjourn until Monday next.

Senate Resolution 206

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow and deep regret the announcement of the death of Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL, late a Senator from the State of Minnesota.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate at the conclusion of its proceedings today adjourn until Monday next.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. BARKLEY and Mr. NORBECK members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments", for the disposition of useless papers in the National Archives.

THE BUDGET (H. DOC. NO. 382)

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered printed.

(For Budget message see Senate proceedings of this day, p. 51.)

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business on Calendar Wednesday of this week may be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have the Clerk read a letter which I have written to Dr. Townsend, together with a resolution, and also to make a remark or two thereafter for not over 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to know what the policy of the majority is going to be with reference to Members addressing the House today and tomorrow. There are several Members on this side of the aisle who would like to make a few general remarks on the state of the Union. If we are going to have some remarks from that side, I especially request that we may also be allowed to make some remarks.

The SPEAKER. The Chair may say, with the consent of the majority leader, that it is expected to take up an appropriation bill on Wednesday. The Chair hopes that those in charge of that particular bill and other appropriation bills will be just as liberal in allowing time for general debate as may be possible under the circumstances. There will be taken up today bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar and tomorrow bills on the Private Calendar. Both of these calendars are greatly congested and disposition ought to be made of these calendars as quickly as possible. As the Chair just stated, an appropriation bill will be taken up on Wednesday. Under these circumstances the Chair feels that he ought not to recognize Members who may ask unanimous consent to discuss matters which may be taken up under general debate. They may get that time by taking the matter up with the chairman in charge of the appropriation bill or the minority leader on the other side of the Chamber.

In deference to Members who have bills on the Private Calendar and who are extremely anxious to have them disposed of, the Chair thinks that those who desire to indulge in general debate should take the course which has been especially provided for this purpose. The Chair does not mean by that statement that he will not recognize a Member who desires a few minutes to address the House. The House itself may dispose of such requests when submitted, but the Chair hopes he will have the indulgence of the Members so far as unanimous-consent requests are concerned that may be covered in general debate. The Chair hopes that the Members of the House will sustain this position, because, as previously stated, there are a great many bills upon these two calendars.

The Chair hopes that answers the question asked by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, as far as I am concerned, I will be pleased to comply with the request of the Chair. However, I want to make my position clear. If anyone on the other side is to be allowed to speak, we shall immediately follow with a request for additional time. We do not want any question about this matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand that the gentleman from Washington asked unanimous consent to address the House.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the request to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I inquire how long it will take to read this letter?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, it took me 5 minutes to dictate the letter.

Mr. TABER. Why not have it printed in the RECORD instead of having it read here? The main purpose will be served.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, why should the gentleman make an objection to this request?

Mr. BANKHEAD demanded the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

DECEMBER 31, 1935.

Dr. F. E. TOWNSEND,
President Old Age Revolving Pensions, Ltd.,
Southern Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR DR. TOWNSEND: I received your questionnaire dated December 3, and was waiting for Congressman ZIONCHECK to return to Washington, D. C., so that he might answer it personally. However, he has not yet returned, hence I am writing this letter so that it may reach you before January 1, for I feel sure that he would wish me to do so in his absence.

I hesitate to express his views in this matter, although he has discussed them quite frankly with me and others. To the best of my recollection they are as follows: (Before starting on this allow me to say that Mr. ZIONCHECK was one of the 57 Representatives who voted for the McGroarty bill.)

In the first place, Congressman ZIONCHECK keenly feels that the present Social Security Act is miserly and inadequate and that the age limitation is too high.

Second, he has no objection to $200 a month for those who are aged, although he does resent it being called a "pension" rather than "compensation", for he looks upon such things as a matter of right rather than as a matter of favor.

Third, he feels that if $200 a month to everyone over 60 years of age will bring about recovery and prosperity, he wonders why you do not ask for $500 and thus bring about a boom.

He has stated on repeated occasions that he will vote for the Townsend bill, or a similar bill, in the event it comes before the coming session of Congress if he is a Member, although he does not agree with the false and unfounded promise of the effects thereof in the event it becomes a law. He has been quite plain about the matter in answers to inquiries from his constituents, and I set forth a copy of the usual letter which he has sent in response to their questions concerning the Townsend plan:

"I am vigorously in favor of an adequate old-age-pension law, and you may rest assured that I will do everything within my power toward that end.

"It is my understanding that Dr. Townsend and his advisers are now preparing a compromise plan which provides for a 2-percent sales tax on comforts and luxuries, the other portion of the revenue to come from gift, income, and inheritance taxes. Personally, I favor any plan that does not impose a tax upon the necessary things of life, for thus it would impose a burden upon those who are least able to pay.

"For your information, I signed the petition to discharge the Ways and Means Committee from the further consideration of the Townsend plan. I was the twelfth one to sign this petition, for I believe that questions which so vitally affect the welfare and well-being of millions of people should be brought to the floor of the House for full and complete discussion and amendment, if necessary, to the end that proper and adequate legislation should be enacted.

"Personally I would be glad to see the aged receive $200 a month or more, if a feasible plan could be worked out, for I recognize the need of economic security for those who have worked and produced in their younger years, together with the argument that their removal from the labor market would create work opportunities for the younger people who seek employment.

"I am disappointed in the so-called social-security bill, introduced by the administration. In my opinion, it is inadequate in many respects, and I am not in sympathy with the manner in which the funds are to be raised."

His opinion, I am satisfied, is that the plan is economically unsound for the following reasons:

First, it provides for a transaction tax on all transactions, and thus taxes those who are least able to pay, as well as those best able to pay. (This transaction tax will also stimulate consolidation and monopoly in order to avoid multiplicity of transactions to avoid the tax.)

Second, the Townsend plan does not provide any means of absorbing the excessive "rake-off" by way of profits that will come about by the stimulated circulation of money by the compulsory spending of the $200 a month. (He illustrates this point by telling of playing poker in a house that takes a "rake-off."

He pictures it as one sitting at a table with others; when bets are made the house man reaches in and takes out a red chip, a blue chip, or more, and, if no one is looking, a handful of chips, and no matter how lucky a person is playing at this game, if he plays long enough the house will have all the chips, and, in his opinion, you cannot improve the situation by handing out more chips and dealing the cards faster.)

Third, he cannot see how it will be possible to compel the beneficiaries of this pension plan to spend the $200 a month unless they want to.

Fourth, it is difficult for him to see how you are going to provide a different medium of exchange for the payment of this pension without removing the dignity therefrom.

The sponsors of the plan seek to justify it on the basis that, aside from its value to the aged, it will increase purchasing power. And by that test it must be judged. Thus judging it, it is defective. For it subtracts at least as much purchasing power from some under-incomed persons as it adds to other under-incomed persons.

What we need is a vast increase in our national income—and a better distribution of a large part of that increase. The national income was some $80,000,000,000 in 1929. It could have been and could be, say, $160,000,000,000. If the bulk of the extra $80,000,000,000 went to those with incomes of less than $3,000 there would be a decent life for all Americans. Congressman ZIONCHECK feels that the trouble with us in 1929 was that our mass-production industries were keeping up their prices and pinching their production—thus reducing purchasing power—while a tiny minority of the people of this country had billions of dollars of income which they could not and would not spend for the products of industry in such a way to keep our industries going and maintain employment. If the mass-production industries would greatly increase their production and lower prices; if we could insure minimum wages; if our increased taxes were so adjusted that most of the revenue came from those persons who cannot and will not spend the bulk of their income for consumers' goods—then our present economic system would work. But the Townsend plan will achieve none of those ends. It will not increase net spending power, but will probably reduce it; it will not increase production or lower prices; it does not concern itself with minimum wages; and its taxing features are in no way designed to compel spending by the over-incomed.

The chief virtue of the Townsend plan is that, if adopted, it will prove a negative; it will demonstrate that the objective at which it aims—prosperity—can be achieved only by intelligent planning and not by tinkering with planlessness.

I have heard Congresman ZIONCHECK express himself as believing this to be the most fantastic idea, illustrating it in the terms of the cat-and-rat ranch, where the rancher raised rats and fed them to the cats, killed the cats, skinned them, and fed the carcasses of the cats to the rats. In other words, we would have had perpetual motion were it not for the irritating and incidental phenomenon known as friction. Nevertheless, he feels that if the Townsend plan becomes a law it will accentuate the inherent contradictions of our profit system and thus more forcefully bring to the conscious realization of the people the need of a fundamental and basic change, where people can work to live and live while they are working.

If Mr. ZIONCHECK had his way about the Townsend plan, he would have a sales tax—not a transaction tax. He would preferably exempt the necessities of life from any tax whatsoever and supplement this loss of tax income by gift, income, and inheritance taxes on those who are able to pay and those who would be the greatest beneficiaries of your artificially stimulated plan. He has stated this view to his constituents on each and every opportunity, so that they labor under no misapprehension as to his views on the matter. And, incidentally, he has stated that in his opinion he has never seen a better racket than the so-called Townsend racket, despite the fact that he thinks that you really believe yourself to be sincere. The best evidence of this, he feels, is that the cofounder and national secretary, Mr. Clements, is a former real-estate shark from Los Angeles, Calif.

Very truly yours,

J. E. YOUNG,
Secretary to M. A. Zioncheck.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, there is a resolution which was included in my unanimous-consent request, and I should like to have that read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 386

Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means, as a whole or by subcommittee, is authorized and directed to investigate any and all charges of attempts to intimidate or influence Members of the House of Representatives with respect to the bill H. R. 7154, or any other bills affecting old-age-pension schemes, or rackets, by which the dimes and dollars of the poor aged enrich the promoters, during the Seventy-fourth Congress, by any person, partnership, trust, association, or corporation, and especially the Townsend set-up. The committee shall report to the House as soon as practicable the results of its investigation, together with its recommendation, if any.

That said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places within the United States, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, by subpena or otherwise, and to take such testimony as it deems necessary. Subpenas shall be issued under the signature of the chairman and shall be served by any person designated by him. The chairman of the committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witnesses. Every person who, having been summoned as a witness by authority of said committee or any subcommittee thereof, willfully makes default or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the investigation heretofore authorized shall be held to the penalties provided by section 102 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

NEW DEAL PROPAGANDA

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein a speech made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] before the National Republican Club in New York on January 4.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] before the National Republican Club in New York on January 4:

I have repeatedly pointed out that the New Deal administration was the greatest propaganda machine in history, and that we were living in a government of propaganda and ballyhoo emanating from hundreds of publicity agents paid out of the Treasury of the United States to defend the socialistic New Deal measures which have destroyed business confidence and retarded recovery. The innovation of the President, who insisted on addressing the Congress at 9 o'clock at night, is the high-water mark of all-time propaganda. It is perfectly obvious to every thinking man and woman that the 9 o'clock session was chosen not for the purpose of presenting information or facts to the Congress on which to determine legislation but to use Congress as window dressing and a springboard to uphold and defend the New Deal and spread partisan propaganda among the people for campaign purposes over a national radio hook-up at night.

The next step will be to get permission from Ivory soap, Old Gold cigarettes, or the Standard Oil to use their time to speak to Congress on the state of the Union. Perhaps even such procedure will not be necessary, for after the President has usurped even more of the legislative powers of Congress he will address Congress over the radio from the White House, combining a fireside chat with his instructions to Congress, which up to now has in a supine and servile manner surrendered their own legislative powers in defiance of the Constitution, betrayed representative government, and left themselves with no more legislative clothing than has Ghandi.

Every historian has pointed out that whenever the executive and legislative powers are combined you have tyranny. As I said the other day, a rose by any other name smells as sweet, and a dictatorship by another name smells as rotten. The President's protestations about liberty and democratic institutions were mere alibis to offset the charges of political and economic dictatorship. The insistence on calling a night session of Congress for propaganda purposes was just another autocratic high-handed dictatorial act in harmony with the general tendency of the New Deal—"I am the State; after me the deluge"—but in the meanwhile there is no limit to anything that will help continue the New Deal for 4 years more—particularly by use of public funds or by radio or other propaganda. A power has arisen in government greater than the people themselves—a veritable Frankenstein of regimentation, bureaucracy, collectivism, and state socialism, consisting of agencies, bureaus, and commissions claiming the right to make laws and issue edicts and held together by the cohesive power of maintaining themselves in office at any cost.

I listened in on the radio to the skillfully organized political demonstration and to the vitriolic campaign speech of the President in the House of Representatives. There were no suggestions, recommendations, or even facts submitted upon which to formulate legislation. It was exactly the kind of political and partisan speech I expected and for which reason I absented myself from Congress, preferring not to abet or be a party to such an undignified performance. It would have been just as well if all Republicans had stayed away, inasmuch as the President made a partisan campaign speech. His remarks sounded to me like that of a desperate man, calling out the mob and preaching class hatred because he knew the New Deal was slipping and that the people had lost confidence in his promises and pledges. Probably the President knows that most of his unsound, un-American, and socialistic experiments will be declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court within the next few months.

It was a campaign speech of a low order, the greater part of which was bitterly partisan, filled with threats against anything of the past and the established order. It could not in any way be called a Presidential message.

The President opened his speech with the good-neighbor theme on the American Continent and expounded at length on the peace and good will that existed there. What about the long, bloody war in the Chaco between Paraguay and Bolivia? What about the recent Communist uprising in Brazil? What about the religious persecution in Mexico and the civil war waging in different sections of that country? What about Venezuela, where, since the death of the dictator, Gomez, there have been civil disturbances? What about Cuba still under a military dictatorship? I merely state the record in answer to the honeyed words and sugar-coated phrases of the President in his speech of last night. Orthodoxy is my doxy and hetodoxy is the other man's doxy seems to be his viewpoint when comparing South and Central America and Mexico to the nations of Europe and Asia.

President Roosevelt has no monopoly in his desire for peace or abhorrence of war, but if we had not stopped him last year by refusing to give him power to determine the aggressor nation we might be entangled in war-producing enmities with Japan, Italy, and even with Germany by now. This was practically the only time that the Congress has refused to yield to the all-consuming appetite and thirst of the President for dictatorial power. The President, however, gave his blessing to the neutrality bill before Congress. Consequently, within the next few days there will be a show-down on the proposed legislation, which will be taken up next Tuesday by the House Committee on Foreign Affairs in order to have it adopted before the temporary 6-month Neutrality Act which expires on the 29th of February. According to the press, the President has been holding numerous conferences with Democratic Members of the House and Senate, but, as far as I know, no Republican has been asked to cooperate. President Roosevelt has departed from the customary practice and established precedents in handling international affairs as he has in most of the other acts of this administration.

His predecessors as President have generally considered it not only advisable but essential to put aside partisanship in dealing with foreign governments. Not so this New Deal administration. From the very beginning it has run its foreign policies on practically a partisan basis without seeking the cooperation or approval of Republican Members of Congress. Such a high-handed and autocratic policy is bound to run into snags and result in unnecessary dissensions.

As ranking Republican member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the House of Representatives, and to that extent the spokesman of my party on international issues, I am opposed to giving the President any additional power to entangle us in foreign disputes and embroil us in war. I led the fight 4 years ago against giving President Hoover and Secretary Stimson the power to lay an embargo against the aggressor nation and again 2 years ago when President Roosevelt made the same request, which is an unneutral act and bound to eventuate in war.

I believe I am representing the views of the Republican Party when I say that it favors strict and impartial neutrality in accordance with the American policy of neutrality established by Washington and upheld by every President and Secretary of State until the last few years. The Republican policy is that if the old nations of the world insist on arming to the teeth and going to war it is their war and not our war.

We are opposed to becoming entangled in ancient foreign blood feuds and boundary disputes, joining the League of Nations, or any war sanctions or commitments. We do not propose to police the world or pick the chestnuts out of the fire for other nations. We are in favor of the traditional American policy of neutrality—that is minding our own business, as we have plenty of problems to solve at home.

To sum up in one sentence, the Republican Party is in favor of spending millions for defense, if necessary, but not one dollar to send American soldiers overseas to fight other peoples' battles. We will vote to give the President power to lay arms and economic embargoes against both belligerents, but not against one. The President and Secretary Hull have repeatedly asked for this far-reaching and vital authority to determine the aggressor nation, but, thank God, it is the only power that a supine Congress has declined to grant. If the Congress yielded, it would be tantamount to empowering the President to declare war instead of the Congress.

The American people have not forgotten that they did their part in the World War and helped turn the tide of defeat into victory. After the armistice was signed and victory won we brought our troops home. We asked for nothing and got just what we asked—nothing at all—no reparations, no indemnities, no plunder, or no conquered territories. But, scarcely was the war won when our former allies began to repudiate their war debts and have even refused to pay interest on the money we loaned them after the armistice. President Roosevelt, among his other achievements, has failed to collect a penny except from Finland.

There is an overwhelming determination on the part of the American people to keep out of foreign wars, and the best way is to maintain the traditional American neutrality policy, and not follow the foreign policy of the New Dealers and internationalists into unneutral acts, the World Court, or the League of Nations through the back door.

The laying of arms and specified economic embargoes against both Italy and Abyssinia will not hamper the decisions reached by the League of Nations, but will preserve our neutrality. If we should, on the other hand, give the President the power which he has consistently sought to lay embargoes against the aggressor alone, it would be a hostile act and cause serious disturbances among millions of Americans of Italian origin in the United States. Then, again, if we adopted such an unneutral policy against Italy, we would have to do it against Japan in China, or may in the near future against Germany in case of war against Soviet Russia. The Republicans, together with independent Democrats, have won an important victory and forced the President to retreat from the position he took last year.

The United States should not become a fire department, rushing from one blaze to another trying to put it out, because eventually we will get badly burned ourselves. In other words, we will be holding the bag for other nations and be expected to do all the fighting.

The Republican Party stands for the kind of neutrality that will keep our country out of war; not the kind of neutrality, as advocated by the New Deal, that leads directly to American participation in foreign wars.

The Republican Party is also opposed to increasing or extending the power of the President, and believes the time has come—if not long since passed—to take back the powers granted the President by Congress and restore constitutional and representative government in the United States and a government by law and not by Executive orders.

The President claims all the credit for the improvement of industry and business during the last 6 months without giving credit to the Supreme Court for holding the N. R. A. unconstitutional. The improvement of business conditions dates from the demise of the N. R. A. and the lifting of fear, dread, and uncertainty off the minds of businessmen. It is definite proof that the New Deal policies have prolonged the depression by destroying business confidence. Confidence and employment are one and inseparable. There can be no steady or permanent jobs for the eleven and a half million unemployed American wage earners without business confidence. We need no New Deal dictatorship, but we need the dictatorship of the Constitution to preserve our free institutions, our American system, and the rights and liberties of the people from Executive usurpation, and business from collectivism and State socialism.

The President's speech to the country is notice that the New Dealers will continue this mad orgy of waste, extravagance, and squandermania without any real expectation of balancing the Budget, economic sanity, or the restoration of business confidence. Business requires more than a breathing spell. It needs assurance that it will be let alone to make legitimate profits and to employ labor on American standards of wages. There can be no real business confidence until the threat of the revolutionary New Deal policies is withdrawn from over the heads of legitimate business. The President again mentions in a vague way the desirability of balancing the Budget, but he has been doing that for 3 years, and we are getting further away from it every month under the New Deal spending program.

He likewise stated there would be no more taxes, which is the most misleading statement ever made by a President of the United States, and a distortion of the facts. Of course there will be no more taxes until after the 1936 campaign is over, but after that the wage earner, the farmer, the small businessman, and people of small means face inflation, repudiation, or bankruptcy.

The political caldron is beginning to seethe and bubble and the ingredients which Macbeth's witches used for their hell's broth were not more various or infernal than those which are being thrown into the mess now being brewed by Prof. Rexford Guy Tugwell and the rest of the "brain trust" at Washington, and ably abetted by some Cabinet officers and at times by the President himself.

The American people, irrespective of party, are horror-struck at the sight of the Government letting loose its own spokesman against the established economic and social order that has made for the greatness, prosperity, happiness, and freedom of our people, with the highest wage scale and standards of living ever known in the world.

Is Under Secretary of Agriculture Rexford Guy Tugwell still a spokesman of the New Deal administration after his recent inflammatory speech at Los Angeles denouncing the capitalistic system and urging that we do away with the "sterile morality of individualism and that all who disagree are tories, autocrats, and enemies, and they must get out of the way with the moral system that supports them"? Professor Tugwell further stirred up the flames of class hatred by saying, "Our best strategy is to surge forward with the workers and farmers of this Nation committed to general achievements but trusting in the genius of our leader for the disposition of our forces and the timing of our attack." Is this the answer to the President's proposed breathing spell? Professor Tugwell goes on to say, "And we should proceed for once in establishing a farmer-worker alliance which will carry all before it, reducing our dependence on halfway measures." I merely ask if Mr. Tugwell still represents the views of the Democratic Party, or have the Democrats stolen the clothes of the Socialist Party? The people have a right to know, as the election is only 10 months away. But after the President's speech last night no one need wonder where the President stands; he stands with and for all the statements of Professor Tugwell and the rest of the "brain trust", almost equaling them in venom and in preaching and inciting class hatred.

We Republicans also have our problems.

Unfortunately, a few of the Old Guard leaders of the Republican Party are hopelessly reactionary and blind to the conditions ahead and will attempt to revive the dead past, which spells ruin for the country and will eventuate in a disastrous radical reaction.

Let us, rather, follow the advice of the great and courageous American, Theodore Roosevelt, who said, "I propose to do everything I can to make the Republican Party stand for sane and constructive liberalism, just as it did under Lincoln." The policy of the Republican Party should clearly be neither to compromise with the socialism of the New Deal or to go back to the old order of alleged domination by special interests, wealth, and reaction, but to go forward on a sound and liberal platform of a square deal for labor, the farmer, the businessman, the consumer, and for private property under the confines and compass of the Constitution of the United States.

Paraphrasing the famous words of Abraham Lincoln, "A house divided against itself cannot stand", I believe this Government cannot endure permanently, half unconstitutional and half constitutional, half based on bureaucracy and socialism and half based on private enterprise and private property. I do not expect the house to fall, but I expect it will cease to be divided. It will become all one thing or all the other. The reelection of the New Deal candidate will hasten the spread of bureaucracy, socialism, and class hatred, whereas the election of a liberal Republican like Senator WILLIAM E. BORAH, or some other liberal who can carry the West, will hasten the restoration of a government by law instead of by Executive order, and assure the permanence of our Constitution and representative form of government, divided into three separate and independent departments of government, the executive, legislative, and judiciary, with its system of checks and balances. The only issue in the next election will be Roosevelt and the economic and political dictatorship of the New Deal, and all Republican conservatives and liberals alike must unite to restore American liberty, our American system and Constitution, and representative government, and to that end I give my heart, my energy, and my best efforts, and likewise to restore the sound principles of the Republican Party and to elect a Republican President next November.

ROOSEVELT OR REACTION

Mr. HILDEBRANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILDEBRANDT. Mr. Speaker, it is becoming more and more evident each day that the campaign of 1936 will involve the most definite line-up of unscrupulous predatory interests—huge profiteering corporations, munitions makers, and other exploiters—against the forces of social justice, progressivism, and real democracy that the United States has ever seen, with the exception perhaps of the campaigns waged by Jefferson and Jackson and the Bryan-McKinley campaign of 1896.

Every trust magnate in America, every individual and organization that has acquired wealth by living on the sweat and blood of the plain people of the country will fight Franklin D. Roosevelt tooth and nail this year.

Every American citizen with a social conscience should therefore support President Roosevelt, regardless of whether or not he is satisfied with the administration's policy in all respects. I am one of many Democrats who believe we should go much farther to the left than we have gone—who are convinced that more sweeping and fundamental changes must be made to end the impoverishment of the producing class by a small group of parasites. Nevertheless, I shall wholeheartedly back the President for reelection, recognizing that his defeat would mean the riveting of new chains on the people by Wall Street and possibly even the establishment of a Fascist dictatorship in the United States.

Big business is furious with rage at the moderate control of its activities so far provided by the administration. If it had more vision and common sense, it would accept this control, realizing that if it strains the public's patience it may be compelled to acquiesce in measures far more drastic than these. However, the "powers that prey" are not noted for vision and common sense. Their greed and avarice are so violent that they hotly resent even the mildest effort to restrain them. Therefore they are fighting the President, and, as Raymond Clapper well said in the Washington Post of December 6, will unite in "a bitter crusade against his reelection."

There is only one thing for the honest believer in economic emancipation to do. That is to vote and work for President Roosevelt and to leave no stone unturned to prevent the return to office of the Hoover-Mellon-Mills Wall Street clique. This is a time when there should be a united front of all citizens who do not want to go back to the conditions of the Hoover administration, when the appeals of the hungry and homeless were met sometimes with callous indifference, sometimes with policemen's clubs, rifles, and bayonets, and sometimes with gas and tear bombs, and when the men who fought in the World War were driven like hunted animals from the Capital City of their country and their pitifully rude shacks burned to the ground!

Every Jeffersonian Democrat, every Republican who derives his inspiration from the ideals of Lincoln, every follower of a minor party devoted to the interests of the "forgotten man"—Farmer-Laborite, Progressive, Socialist, and so forth—should disregard differences over details of policy next year and join hands in a common cause against a common enemy.

In the 1936 campaign, despite the inadequacy of some of the legislation so far enacted, Franklin D. Roosevelt will be the leader in one of the greatest conflicts in all history between humanity and property—the champion of Lazarus at the gates of Dives.

There will be but one issue next year—"Roosevelt or Reaction?"

On such an issue the American people can have but one answer.

THE VETERANS OF FUTURE WARFARE

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following speech which I delivered at a meeting of the Veterans of Foreign Wars at Flat River, Mo., on November 10, 1935:

Mr. Chairman, members of all veterans' organizations, and friends, I want to express my appreciation for the opportunity to be here on this occasion and to enjoy your kind hospitality and friendly greeting. Organizations such as yours keep alive and active the spirit of patriotism and true devotion to American ideals and institutions. Yours is an organization that stands for a square deal, that informs the country on the various problems of government, that teaches brotherly love and esteem, that inculcates a friendly feeling in the community, and, above all, inspires a truer love of country and an unswerving loyalty to our flag.

Seventeen years ago tomorrow the hearts of the American people were made glad by the declaration of the armistice which brought to an end the greatest war in history. It had wrought widespread destruction to property; it had taken an immense toll in human life and had left in its wake many bankrupt nations and much misery and suffering. During the stirring days of '17 and '18, when millions of the flower of America's young manhood entrained for camp, we went with them to the courthouses, where patriotic speeches were made and martial music was played and inspiring songs were sung. Then we went with them to the railroad stations and, as the trains bore them away, we bade them Godspeed and waved them goodbye. And then during the following weeks and months we read the newspapers and scanned the bulletins with bated breath and anxious hearts for the latest news. Many restless days and sleepless nights were spent.

There was established an invisible line reaching from the threshold and fireside of every American home to the fields and trenches of France over which were sent messages of hope and cheer and along which could be heard the whisperings of mothers' prayers. Those were times that tried men's souls, and it is little wonder that there was wild enthusiasm and unrestrained happiness and joy at the news of the armistice on November 11, 1918. In the meantime many fine, brave American boys had made the supreme sacrifice on foreign soil. Then began the long, slow, tedious trek homeward of the finest and most courageous body of men ever assembled on earth. Many of them were maimed and crippled. Others were diseased in body and broken in spirit. Myriads of these young men had left homes of comfort and abandoned careers of promise in order to serve their country. In many cases they returned to find themselves disabled and handicapped, without a job, and the prospect for the future gloomy.

There is a tendency among Americans in the rush and hurry of our modern times to forget. We are too much engrossed in other affairs, in the hubbub and babble and the crashing and shrieking and clanging of the commercial and industrial life to think about the more essential things. We are so absorbed in selfish and personal interests that we do not recall the heroic deeds and the noble sacrifices made by the young men of this Nation on the field of battle.

A few years ago there were brought back from the fields of France the remains of the Unknown American Soldier. The casket was placed beneath the dome of our National Capitol. For 24 hours a stream of humanity flowed by. The great generals and admirals of the largest armies and navies of the world in all their military and naval array passed by. Ambassadors, ministers, and representatives of all foreign powers were there. Representatives of the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of the Government came. In the procession were found tottering and feeble veterans of former wars, those whose ranks are growing thinner and thinner with the passing of the years. There came his comrades, some of them maimed and crippled, and as they paused beside the casket they were thinking that it might contain the remains of one by whose side they had fought and struggled and sacrificed on the field of battle; one of their buddies who had fallen by their side. In front of the casket mothers halted with sad heart and tear-dimmed eyes wondering if it contained the remains of her long-lost boy. From every nook and corner of the world and from every rank and station, men, women, and children came, and as they came they brought flowers of every tint and color and fragrance and placed them upon and around the casket until the Hall was filled. They brought the beautiful flowers that their petaled lips and perfumed breath could in eloquent and fragrant language express the tribute which the bearers so deeply felt.

In all ages of the past, kings and rulers have been laid to rest with all the pomp and glory of their positions; presidents and great men have been taken to their last resting place with the sorrow and sympathy of the nation hovering over them. But in all the history of the world no such tribute was ever paid as was shown the Unknown American Soldier on that occasion. Why did they come? Not to pay tribute to any particular soldier or any individual, for they did not even know who he was. They did not know whether he came from the shipyards or marts of the Atlantic coast or the factories of the East. They did not know whether he came from the logging camps of the North or the wheatfields of the Northwest. They did not know whether he came from the orchards of the Pacific coast or the cotton plantations of the South. They did not know whether he was a Missouri boy who had left his hoe and his plow to rust in a Missouri cornfield to answer his country's call. They only knew that he had fallen on the field of battle fighting for the defense of his country and the preservation of free institutions and human liberty throughout the world, and that someone sometime loved him. Why did they come? They came to pay homage and tribute to the ideals, the institutions, the principles, the aspirations and hopes for which the American soldier fought. The remains were placed in Arlington Cemetery just to the east of that beautiful and magnificent memorial building erected in memory and in honor of those boys who made the sacrifice in those trying days. And there in front of that simple tomb, faithful soldiers, in sunshine and in rain walk their beat as silent sentinels, keeping watch over his grave. Organizations and meetings like this should recall and revive the feelings and sentiments of other days.

To the Spanish-American War veterans, those who enlisted in the War against Spain, I want to pay a tribute of highest praise. At that time I was a student at Missouri University. Some of my classmates enlisted. Of that number three of the finest and best young men I ever knew never came back. To commemorate their life and death the students by subscription raised the money with which a beautiful old-gold and black tablet was purchased and placed on the wall in Jesse Hall, the main building of the university. It was my privilege to deliver the memorial address presenting the tablet to the school, and the late beloved and lamented Walter Williams in one of his inimitable speeches accepted the tablet on behalf of the university, and it remains there today as a monument to the memory of those boys who gave their lives in that conflict.

The enlistment of the young men in the service at that time from every section of the country was proof conclusive that the bitterness and strife of Civil War days were buried forever in an oblivion of forgiveness that forgets. The sons of the blue from the wind-swept Lakes of the North marched side by side with the sons of the gray from the sun-kissed lagoons of the South in a common cause. Old Joe Wheeler, who had fought with all the valor and courage of a southern gentleman to keep a race in slavery and subjection, marched up the heights of San Juan Hill at the head of a colored regiment to drive from the Western Continent the last vestige of Spanish tyranny and oppression.

The story is told that after the San Juan Battle the nurses and doctors with their aides went upon the battlefield and gathered up the wounded and dying and brought them into the hospital. They were placed on cots in the halls and wards until the building was fairly crowded. Over in one corner lay a wounded American soldier. Raising himself on his elbow he began the song:

"My country, 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty,
Of thee I sing."

The moans and cries of the wounded were silenced, and those who were able took up the refrain,

"Land where my fathers died,
Land of the Pilgrims' pride,
From every mountain side
Let freedom ring."

And I tell you, my friends, this afternoon, that I would rather have the sentiment of that song written large and deep on the hearts of the American people than to have us the proud possessors of the largest standing army and the strongest navy that the world affords. That was the spirit and the sentiment of the boys who marched to battle in '98 and all honor and glory to them.

I witnessed one of the finest examples of loyalty and forbearance on the part of those who participated in what is known as the "bonus" march on Washington in 1932. The House had passed the measure providing for the payment of the adjusted-compensation certificates, and, as you know, I voted for it. The bill had gone over to the Senate for consideration. Thousands of the soldier boys had gathered on the steps leading to the Senate Chamber and on the plaza in front of the Capitol. The debate in the Senate was prolonged, extending late into the night. Many of the boys had grown tired and had fallen asleep while awaiting the outcome. At last the news came that the Senate had defeated the measure. There was no bitterness or resentment, no turmoil or threat, but, on the other hand, they all arose and sang America. That was the spirit behind their movement, and all glory and honor to them.

This Government has been liberal toward those who were disabled by reason of disease or injury while in military service. It has been solicitious for the widows, the children, and the dependents of those who lost their lives in the service of their country. It has provided various forms of relief—war-risk insurance, hospitalization, vocational education, a bonus—adjusted-compensation certificates, pensions, and service-connected compensation. Compared with other nations, our Government has been most generous, providing much more help and granting much more liberal rewards than any other nation on earth. This it should do. Many veterans have found it difficult and some have found it impossible to establish service-connected disability, and in some cases inequities have crept in and some injustice has been done. It has been my constant purpose and will continue to be my steadfast aim to render every possible service to the veterans and their dependents. I have in my files now 456 cases which I have taken up with the Veterans' Administration, to say nothing of the many cases which I have handled in the past and on which the file has been closed. By continued and persistent efforts I secured the passage during the last session of Congress of 15 private pension bills for the dependents of old soldiers.

Much has been said and written about the payment of the adjusted-compensation certificates, commonly but mistakenly called the "bonus." I have voted for immediate payment every chance I had. This was done not merely to satisfy the wishes and meet the requests of the veterans but because I believed it to be just and right. During the war and the period immediately following it many men and corporations engaged in industry made excess profits, received inordinate incomes, and accumulated great wealth. This was being done while the soldiers were denied the opportunities offered in civil life and while they were enduring the hardship and suffering incident to camp and trench life and were paid a mere pittance. At the close of the war thousands of war claims made by the railroads, munitions plants, manufacturers of arms, and others were settled, and many millions of dollars were paid them in cash then. The settlement was not postponed 8 years and a certificate given in payment which was not due for 20 years more. The veterans' compensation was due when the service was rendered and should have been paid at the close of the war. That compensation with interest from that time to now will equal the face value of the certificates, and for that reason they should be paid now. Industry made money during the war while the boys were denied the chance to thrive and prosper.

At the close of the war industry adjusted its claims with the Government and received cash in payment. Why should not the adjusted claims of the veterans, that are in equity and justice due, be paid? I have no authority to speak for the legislative or executive branches of the Government, but it is my prediction that satisfactory bonus legislation will be passed at the next session of Congress. I can assure you one thing—that I will continue to work and vote for the immediate cash payment of the adjusted-compensation certificates, and the Government should forego and remit the interest.

The practical, selfish, sordid things of life must not be permitted to crowd out or destroy our gratitude and love for those who answered their country's call.

War has never been of our seeking. It has been thrust upon us. Selfishness and avarice, despotism and arrogance, greed and love of power asserted themselves and created the crises which could only be settled by an appeal to arms. We have no effete or corrupt dynasties to maintain; no tottering thrones to support; no feudal or lordly classes or castes to uphold; no foreign conquests to make; no additional territory to acquire; no vengeance to wreak upon anyone; no unholy alliance to abide by; no unrighteous ambition to satisfy. We are not looking for other worlds to conquer. We want no more wars. We desire peace.

In whatever conflicts we have engaged, it has been in the defense of principles and to maintain our ideals and to preserve our Nation and our honor and to keep our flag unspotted and undefiled. The bravery and the valor, the courage and the manhood of American soldiers, sailors, and marines on land and sea are unexcelled in the annals of history. Wherever they have carried the flag it has been in a just and righteous cause.

Realizing the horrors of warfare, the sorrow, the suffering, and sacrifice that it entails; the terrible waste and destruction that it brings; the desolation and ruin that it leaves in its wake; the heavy financial and economic burdens that it places upon future generations, it does seem that some plan could be devised by which war could be abolished or the chances of its returning reduced to a minimum. Aside from its horrors, its sorrow, the suffering and sacrifice, from a purely economic, a financial, and a business standpoint, warfare should be avoided. From 70 to 90 cents of every dollar collected in taxes by the nations of the world go to pay the expenses of past wars and in preparation for warfare in the future. Remove the probability of future wars and the enormous burden, which is now placed upon the people by reason of war, will be lifted.

The expense of all other Government activity pales into insignificance beside the war burdens. The expense of all the peace activities of government is practically nothing compared with that of war. It seems rather strange that the major portion of our Government expenses should be devoted to the agencies of destruction and desolation and ruin rather than to those of improvement and development and progress, to better educational facilities, the alleviation of suffering, the abolition of poverty and destitution, the restoration of social justice, and the establishment of those institutions that will bring happiness and contentment to the people. But we have not reached the stage where the element of force can be safely banished from consideration; where a resort to arms may not be necessary. Momentous hours may come when some nation will make war upon an institution or a nation rather than let it live and others will accept war rather than let the nation die.

Your organization stands for the preservation of high American ideals, for the eradication of all disloyal propaganda, for the elimination of all communistic tendencies, and for the proper preparation for the protection and defense of our country.

On the question of preparedness for war, the maintenance of an army and a navy, there are three well-defined schools of thought in this country. There are the extreme pacifists—members of certain religious, social, and fraternal organizations—who, because of religious or conscientious scruples, think we should have peace at any price. They would tear down our military barracks, dismantle our forts, and junk our Navy. They would abolish all forms of military training. They are conscientiously opposed to bearing arms under any condition. They are not in favor of maintaining a navy sufficient to protect and guard the avenues of our commerce in times of peace. They seem to think that war can be averted by a pious discussion of the horrors of war within the narrow confines of their sacred portals. When the dark and ugly storm clouds of war gather they take refuge behind their conscientious objection to war in order to avoid military duty. You will find none of that class among the great martyrs or heroes of history. They are the milk-and-mush members of society.

In days of great national disaster, in hours of stress and strain, in times that try men's souls, and that call for action and courage, that class is found skulking away in the rear. They are of the kind that would have peace at the sacrifice of honor. They have a narrow and limited vision, and are unmindful of the lessons of history and indifferent to the laws of human nature. They are fanatical, unmoved by the dictates of reason, and untouched by the simplest and plainest appeals of common sense. There may be worse things in the life of a nation, as well as in the life of an individual, than a fight or a battle. Abject submission to wrong, tyranny, and oppression, and a cowardly surrender of our rights and honor are infinitely worse than the loss of life on the battlefield in the defense of justice and honor. The world cannot be reformed by a resolution. War cannot be avoided by a wave of the hand. Strife cannot be exterminated by a spray of rose water. There is a difference between peace and pacifism. There is little good done by these extreme fanatical pacifists.

At the other end of the argument are the extreme militarists. Those who make war and the preparation for war a business. The major generals, the admirals, the chiefs of staff, the lieutenants, the colonels, the commanders in chief, and the captains; those who have been tutored and trained and are skilled in the art of war. Those who are sounding the trumpets of alarm and rattling their swords; those who continually see the war clouds gathering and rising along the horizon. It would seem of little use to have international conferences for the limitation of naval armament and the reduction of military forces as long as those meetings are attended and dominated by admirals and major generals. Conference after conference has been held, and still the representatives at those meetings have returned to the nation which they represented, and the navy-building program has been enlarged and the military positions have been strengthened. These conferences up to this date have been "full of sound and fury, signifying nothing." There are too many Alexanders the Great, too many Napoleons, too many Mussolinis, too many Ludendorffs and Hitlers abroad in the land preaching the doctrine of suspicion and hate among the nations and advocating the building of the strongest navy and the maintaining of the largest army. They are encouraging their nation to build the most forts and barracks and to construct the largest war vessels, dreadnaughts, cruisers, destroyers, submarines, and aircraft carriers and mount them all with guns that will shoot farther than those which other vessels have. This thing has continued until the United States has constructed two aircraft carriers that have a displacement of 33,000 tons, are almost 1,000 feet in length, and can each carry fully equipped and ready for action 100 airplanes, with a take-off and a landing deck. These war lords demand increased preparedness. These extreme militarists are a menace and as dangerous as the extreme pacifists.

Between the extreme pacifists and the radical militarists stand those who represent the sane, rational, sober thought of the Nation on the question of preparedness. They are not as loud or as well organized as the others, but they compose the great mass of the American people. They believe in fighting if it becomes necessary to defend our honor and to preserve our liberties and our rights. They believe that we should maintain a reasonable navy as the first line of defense and to police the seas in time of peace. Not that we should have more and bigger war vessels than any other nation, but a reasonable equipment in accordance with our needs and our position among the nations of the world. Not that we should destroy our forts and barracks and abolish all military training, but that we should maintain headquarters and training grounds in charge of men familiar with military tactics, which may form the nucleus around which a citizen-soldier army can be built in time of need. Those who think that a reasonable amount of military and naval preparation is necessary as a matter of self-defense and self-preservation, those who think that a complete destruction of all military and naval organization would be an invitation to the nations of earth for invasion and conquest, those who believe that the support and maintenance of reasonable military and naval establishments are the surest guaranty against invasion or warfare—the men and women who occupy this great middle ground, who entertain these sound and reasonable ideas on the question of preparedness, comprise the overwhelming majority of the people of earth. They need organization; they need cooperation and coordination to develop public sentiment and create a feeling of friendship and good will among the nations of earth. The time has come when the Government should devote most of its time and money to the agencies and institutions of peace rather than to the instrumentalities of war. The time is when the radical arguments of the militarists and the fanatical appeals of the pacifists must pass into the discard and the sober common sense of the people must assert itself.

The time may have been in ages ago when the nations of earth were living unto themselves, ignorant and indifferent as to the progress, the motives, the ambitions of others, when each nation may have been hostile, suspicious, and jealous toward the others. In this age of invention and progress, with improved methods of transportation and modern means of communication, when each nation knows what the other is doing, there is no longer any reason for the unfounded suspicions, the petty jealousies, and secret hostilities. It is earnestly to be desired that the time may soon come when the unselfish, sincere statesmen and diplomats of the world, with the only purpose to serve and secure the highest degree of social justice for the people, guided by rational public opinion, uninfluenced by the swashbuckling jingoism of the militarists and unmoved by the wild, impassioned appeals of the pacifists, in a spirit of friendship, good will, and fellowship, may sit down around the council table and there formulate some plan to lessen the chances for war, a plan which will have the sanction of public opinion throughout the world and lead us into the paths of peace.

My sincere wish and fondest hope is that the time may soon come when the swords will be beaten into plowshares and spears be made into pruning hooks, and that the dream of Tennyson will be realized when the "war drum throbs no longer and the battle flag be furled in the parliament of man, the federation of the world." Upon those who bring about that condition the everlasting blessings of mankind should rest.

This talk would not be complete without a fitting tribute to our national emblem which is here displayed. At the sight of it the heart of every true American wells with joy and pride, proud of its history, proud of its achievements, proud of the ideals and institutions for which it stands. The stars in its firmament have ever increased in number and grown in brightness. The constancy, loyalty, and fidelity of its blue has not faded with the passing years; the purity and chastity of its white has remained unspotted and undefiled; the valor and sacrifice of its red has ever led to nobler deeds and inspired a loftier patriotism. In its history and development its form and design have changed, but it is the same flag still. Whether it is of the finest silk, in the most brilliant and costly colors, upon a staff of gold and tinsel, or whether it is of the commonest cloth, whose color may be dimmed by time and whose folds may be tattered and torn, it is the same flag still. Whether it waves from the stately and massive structures in the city in commemoration of some great event where it is greeted and cheered by thousands, or whether it silently floats in the breezes over the threshold of the humblest cottage in the far-away countryside, it's the same flag still.

It is the flag that encouraged and inspired Washington and his little band of faithful followers as they stood in their bare feet and tattered garments, shivering around the campfires at Valley Forge. It is the flag that waved in triumph over the ramparts at Yorktown when Cornwallis surrendered and we became an independent Nation. It is the flag that the brave, courageous boys of the Spanish-American War carried to such signal victory, to destroy the last remnant of monarchy in the New World and to establish this continent as the home of republics. It is the same flag that, in the greatest of all wars, our brave and courageous boys carried all the way from Chateau Thierry to the Argonne and to a triumphant victory; the same flag that, with a valor and courage unequaled in the annals of mankind, they carried in defense of the honor and integrity of our own Nation and in the defense and preservation of free institutions and human liberty throughout the world. It is the same flag that in the development of civilization and in its progress around the world has brought courage, inspiration, and hope to the oppressed and downtrodden nations and peoples of the earth. Wherever it has gone, whatever has been its mission, whether on land or sea, it has always come back home with honor written on its silken folds, with its blue unclouded, and its stars undimmed. "Long may it wave, o'er the land of the free and the home of the brave."

A PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, what becomes of the resolution that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. ZIONCHECK] has just offered?

The SPEAKER. Is has been read for the information of the House. When it is introduced, it will be referred to the appropriate committee.

NEUTRALITY

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include also a speech on the same subject of neutrality made by another person.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, leaving the last session of Congress, I made several talks over the radio and several before audiences concerning neutrality and peace. One talk I made November 11 in Denver, Colo., dedicated to my old regiment, One Hundred and Fifty-seventh Infantry (1st Colorado), which was on the radio over a national hook-up; November 26, before the University City Peace Council, University City (a suburb of St. Louis), Mo.; I also spoke before the League of Women Voters at the Sidney Lanier Junior High School in Houston, Tex., December 12; several times in San Antonio, Tex., my district, before various groups. I also made a radio address over Station WMAL, Washington, D. C., on my return, which was carried on the National Broadcasting Co. network, last Saturday, January 4.

One of the most distinguished advocates of peace and authorities in this country on the subject of neutrality and international law is Dr. S. D. Myres, Jr., of Southern Methodist University, Dallas, Tex. He is connected with the Arnold Foundation in Public Affairs at that university. The Arnold Foundation is doing great work. Dr. Myres spoke with me on the program in Houston, Tex., before the League of Women Voters, and his speech received widespread editorial comment over the South, as well as publicity over the Nation.

I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD the speech of Dr. Myres. It is as follows:

NEUTRALITY AS A NECESSITY

[By S. D. Myres, Jr., Director the Arnold Foundation in Public Affairs, Southern Methodist University]

Today almost everyone recognizes the imminence of another general war. Europe has recently experienced one crisis after another and Asia is in the throes of political unrest. Italy ruthlessly throws her armies against Ethiopia, while England and France, acting nominally in behalf of the League of Nations but in fact governed by considerations of national interest, strongly protest and threaten to use sanctions against this aggression. Japan, criticized and warned by the League and the nations signatory to the Paris Pact, nevertheless pushes on into China, consolidating her gains and proving as have the western powers time and again that might makes right—at least when one plays the game of imperialism against a weak and defenseless neighbor.

Germany, regarded by many as the key to the problem of Europe, renounces those parts of the Treaty of Versailles which stand in the way of her regaining her coveted place in the sun. Reparations she holds to be unjust and unpayable; restrictions on the size and character of her military and naval organizations she declares to be inequitable and void. The failure of other nations, including France, to carry out their pledges to disarm, Germany assigned as a reason for her action. Regardless of the merits or demerits of her case, the bold steps which she has taken have opened the way for a renewal of the competition in military affairs which 30 years ago led straight to the World War.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS AND NATIONAL WELFARE

The political atmosphere of Europe is already supercharged with fears of impending trouble; and in spite of the unflagging efforts of the League of Nations to maintain a community of interests for peace, the old system of balance of power, of alliance versus alliance, has reappeared to crystallize discord into armed conflict.

In troublesome times like the present, it is only natural for the American people to take stock of the situation and to adopt such course of action as will protect their national welfare. The citizens of this country have not forgotten the World War and what it cost, and will not lightly see the Nation plunged into another cataclysm, no matter what special interests may urge it or what phrases may be utilized to arouse their emotional responses. It has been estimated that the war of 1917 cost us 55 billion dollars in treasure and 350,000 lives, plus many other losses which came as byproducts.

How we became involved in the war and why we fought it are questions on which historians are not entirely agreed, but one thing does seem rather clear—what we gained from it is negligible. Perhaps the fundamental object for which we fought was freedom of the seas. Although Wilson wanted this issue settled, the peace conference ignored it entirely—and we are no nearer the attainment of our goal than when we took up arms. The world was to be made "safe for democracy." But look at the dictators who rule even in the more enlightened countries—look at Mussolini, Hitler, Stalin. The rights of small nations were to be safeguarded. But witness the rape of Manchuria and Ethiopia. Ignoring certain territorial readjustments in Europe and the establishment of the mandates system, the one constructive result of the war was the founding of the League of Nations. But the United States has not chosen to participate in the League, and the principles of that organization are apparently being scuttled by its big members as they pursue with determination the selfish foreign policies of their respective governments.

With such conditions as these prevalent in the world, it is hardly strange that thinking men and women in the United States should resolve to keep our Nation out of another war. This feeling is so well-nigh unanimous that we can definitely regard it as a fundamental of our foreign policy for the immediate future. Now, in seeking a means to make effective this determination of the American people to avoid war and maintain peace, three possible choices are before us. The first is to build an Army and Navy strong enough to prevent war by force. The second is to cooperate whole-heartedly with other nations to maintain peace. And the third is to pursue a policy of strict neutrality. Let us briefly examine each of these approaches to the problem.

The prevention of war by military action involves a contradiction at the outset, for military action is the essence of war. Those who advocate preparedness as a basis for peace rarely contemplate the actual use of the military arm; what they rely on chiefly is the threat to potential disturbers of the peace involved in the very existence of superior forces. Now, against bandits in China or rebels in Nicaragua, the employment of armed forces in the cause of peace can be, and often is, efficacious. But that is not what we are talking of here—we are discussing the creation of an Army and Navy big enough to confront any of the great powers, or combination of such powers, when they endanger our rights or security as a nation.

METHODS TO ATTAIN PEACE

One does not need to be a pacifist to see that the organization of a military machine strong enough to dominate the world in any emergency which might arise is open to the gravest difficulties. First, it is physically and financially impossible. The shifting character of alliances in international politics creates combinations which cannot be safely anticipated. The cost in money to meet this situation would approach the aggregate expended by all states which might from time to time impinge upon our interests. That such a drain on our natural resources could hardly be endured calls for little proof. Moreover, the course suggested would prove futile. Any effort on our part to build a navy to enforce our rights against, say, England and Japan would cause them at once to increase their construction programs, and the end would likely come only after all three powers were economically exhausted or engaged in war. Germany tried a policy similar to this one before 1914, and her failure speaks for itself. Finally, militarism in the exaggerated sense violates the American tradition. In this country the civil authority has always been supreme; and all free men and women want it to continue so. It is unthinkable that the United States should be converted into an armed camp, as is the case in Italy, Japan, and certain other nations. We desire, and will continue to maintain, adequate forces for the defense of our territory; but we reject the fallacy that national security can be guaranteed only by building the greatest army and navy in the world.

International cooperation for peace doubtless offers the greatest ultimate hope. The development of a comprehensive system of international law and the machinery to apply it is imperative if civilization is to be long maintained. This process, however, will require many years. At present, international law and international institutions are in a retarded state of development. Both the law of peace and the law of war are full of gaps and contradictions, as any effort at codification readily reveals. Also the machinery to apply the law is inadequate. The most satisfactory agency is, of course, the League of Nations. But with all its merits—and it has many—it has not yet proved dependable in dealing with major political disputes. It is true that the absence of the United States from the League has weakened its action; nevertheless, the states which are members have also contributed to its ineffectiveness by their almost constant rivalries as they have played the game of power politics. Frequently the Great Powers, such as France, England, Italy, Germany, and Japan, have used the League as a mere chessboard on which to play the game. And when some of them have begun to lose, they have left the table.

The League, obviously, cannot be blamed for this condition; rather the individual nations themselves, actuated by prejudices, fears, and ambitions, must bear the responsibility. Under such circumstances, no League member feels that it can trust that organization implicitly to guarantee its security. All members maintain armed forces, and the states which count for most in the League today—England, France, and Russia—have the strongest naval and military organizations in the world.

DIFFICULT TO DETERMINE AGGRESSOR NATION

Many persons look for the achievement of peace by means of collective sanctions. The time may come when an outlaw nation will be punished in somewhat the same fashion as an individual criminal is now. The moment, however, has not yet arrived when we can rely on this procedure. It is no easy matter, for example, to determine aggression. It is vastly more difficult to proceed effectively against the aggressor, especially if the aggressor is a powerful nation. Suppose the aggressor refuses to accept the sanctions voted, as did Japan during the dispute over Manchuria—who will then apply them? In the case mentioned, the British Navy was the logical agency for the purpose, but was not used. Why? Because England did not want to fight Japan. You thus see the basic contradiction in the use of sanctions, with the world organized nationally as it is today. Sanctions applied in the name of international justice and peace are too likely to cause the very thing they are aimed against—international war and injustice. The series of crises which has recently occurred in the triangular discussions between Italy, Ethiopia, and the League serves to confirm this conclusion. This controversy illustrates how easily the employment of sanctions can generalize a dispute—one essentially between Italy, Ethiopia, and Great Britain—by drawing in the other powers of Europe. The danger of a general European war has thus been increased, especially in view of the basic rivalry between France and Germany and between Germany and Russia.

What, then, should be the policy of the United States? Our Government should continue—in fact, should increase—its collaboration with other nations to create a world of law and order. Its participation in the work of the International Labor Office, the League of Nations, and various conferences which seek to limit armaments, develop and codify international law, and facilitate international trade should not be diminished. We should contribute in every reasonable manner to the advancement of international justice, peace, and security. But at the same time we should bear in mind the realities of world politics and refuse to be carried away by a zeal for humanity, democracy, and other concepts which blind us to our true national interests.

NEUTRALITY ONLY SAFE COURSE

With the world upset as it is today—torn by passions, on the verge of general war—the only safe and sensible course open to us is strict neutrality. If Europe finds it necessary to apply collective sanctions in settling her disputes, let us not interfere. If the League must resort to article XVI of the Covenant to enforce the decisions of the Council and Assembly, let it be known that the United States will not ship arms and munitions or extend credits to any of the parties involved in the controversy. By such means the uncertainty of our policy regarding sanctions—long criticized by League members as an obstacle to peace and security—will be eliminated.

After all, regardless of theories to the contrary, the principle of neutrality remains a cardinal part of international law and practice. Members of the League of Nations today accept and act on this principle, as the reservations generally adopted in interpreting article X and the Pact of Paris show. Neutrality has been a basic American doctrine since the time of Washington, but new conditions require that it be reinterpreted. The introduction of the submarine, all-inclusive contraband lists, and so-called measures of blockade have greatly altered the situation respecting freedom of the seas in wartime. Our failure to recognize this changed status of naval warfare was directly responsible for our involvement in the conflict of 1917. Stating the matter simply, we insisted on the right of our private citizens to trade and travel freely in the war zones with complete immunity. Such risks as they took were not simply their own; these risks concerned the sovereignty of the American people. It was inevitable that this interpretation of the law of neutrality should encourage our citizens to take additional risks and should ultimately lead us into the war.

Recently, congressional committees have studied this question in the light of our experience in the World War, and have concluded that legislation should be enacted to strengthen our position of neutrality. The joint resolution passed during the closing hours of the last session of Congress is an initial step. This act is incomplete and it expires in approximately 2½ months. The chief provisions of this measure prohibit the export of arms, munitions, and implements of war to belligerents; provide that those who trade with belligerents do so at their own risk; and provide that persons traveling on belligerent ships do so at their risk. Especially noticeable is the absence of restrictions on loans and credits and on trade in commodities commonly used in warfare, such as oil, cotton, and steel.

WHAT NEUTRALITY LEGISLATION SHOULD CONTAIN

There seems to be little doubt that the Congress which meets in January will adopt a more comprehensive neutrality act. However, much difference of opinion naturally exists concerning the provisions to be included. I am personally of the opinion that the new legislation should contain the following points: An embargo on arms and munitions to all states engaged in armed conflict; the licensing, on a peacetime basis, of shipments of other goods bound directly or indirectly to the belligerents; the prohibition of all loans and credits to belligerents; the withholding of passports to American citizens who seek to travel in war zones; the prohibition of American vessels from carrying munitions, and strict limitations on their carrying contraband. So far as possible, the legislation should be automatic; the President should be relieved of strain like that experienced by Wilson in the years 1914–17. Legislation which is clear and unequivocal would do much to lessen the danger of war psychology, always a threat to peace when our position of neutrality is uncertain. Adequate provision, however, should be made for the exercise of Executive discretion in situations which cannot be fully anticipated and covered by legal regulations.

Aside from such technicalities—and all of them are important—the basic question before the American people is relatively simple: Do we really want to stay out of war enough to pay the price of peace? Will our manufacturers and businessmen be willing to forego profits which they may never collect? Can we as a nation restrain our emotions when we are merely annoyed, and when the national interest is not endangered? From the beginning of its history, our country has enjoyed a unique position among the nations. Blessed by geographical remoteness, it has been able to develop its culture and institutions largely undisturbed by the disruptive influences common to Old World politics. The greatest danger of surrendering this favored position has always been, and is today, in the likelihood that we shall become involved in warfare outside our territorial limits. A policy of neutrality, carefully planned and resolutely followed, offers us the best hope of maintaining the national advantages which are ours by heritage. I am convinced, moreover, that this policy would be of great value to the cause of true internationalism. I speak not as an isolationist but as one interested in the welfare of the world community when I urge that the most constructive measure which our Government can take at the present moment of tension and unrest is to adopt a neutrality act so complete and effective that the resources of the United States cannot be utilized by any state which resorts to war in disregard of its solemn pledges to keep the peace. Neutrality, I take it, is thus a national and international necessity.

WAR WILL SWEEP AWAY ALL CHANCES OF RECOVERY

Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to deliver more or less a résumé of the speeches I made this summer on neutrality.

I visited around 20 States, not known as a Congressman but as an individual in ordinary rough traveling clothes, and I found the American people want one thing: To stay out of war. Also, they are overwhelmingly in favor of mandatory neutrality.

Mr. Speaker, the question of peace—I mean of this Nation's staying out of war altogether—may prove to be the most important question before the American people in our national history.

This is because if we are drawn into a war, then war necessity will require that every law that is written shall be merely to win that war. All chance of recovery, all chance of maintaining any of our civil liberties, or ordinary liberties, will be swept away. All other legislation, all other efforts, will be subordinated to the dread horror of war and the effort to make one great, powerful military and naval machine. This machine will be dedicated to the killing of human beings—which in the past has not done much for human liberty—and to the destruction of the physical property of the enemy—and which never really saved the property rights of a nation at home either.

So I think that the American people, and we, the representatives of the people, should strain every nerve, every muscle, every brain cell—and all our hearts—to stay out of war. I think it rather obvious that we all agree on that, and the question is, How are we going to do it?

Well, for a full year now we have been discussing neutrality, and whether it shall be mandatory or discretionary. Many have expected a bitter controversy, but it appears the administration and the State Department are submitting a bill considerably better than any they have submitted before, recognizing the true spirit of neutrality and the new idea of neutrality. Thus the various groups of thought here in Washington may reach a final decision rather quickly and which I am sure will meet with the almost unanimous support of the American people.

DISCRETIONARY AND MANDATORY NEUTRALITY

Last year we enacted a neutrality bill, and it was supposed to be mandatory, but it had a "may" or two in it you know—m-a-y—and that looked like a discretionary grant where the President would have all the power of war or peace. But that is rather well cleared up now, because the President last Friday night, in his masterful address on the opening day of Congress, acknowledged the principle of mandatory neutrality and the policy of the good neighbor.

And it looks like the State Department and Secretary Hull are riding down the right track now, too. For a while, it looked like Secretary Hull might be trying to ride two horses—an American horse and a League of Nations horse. What we want him to do is to ride just one horse—a good old American horse, and not use an English saddle, either. English saddles, though they look attractive, are very slippery and expensive—our good Secretary might fall off—so I think it better that he get a good Texas saddle and ride the American horse down the neutrality track. In any event, we must have no trick riding.

Personally, speaking of Congressmen, I know of no Congressman or Senator who would play politics on a matter that concerns war, and a poll shows 85 percent of the Representatives and 90 percent of the Senators favor the strictest and most mandatory type of neutrality. I am only one Congressman. Many of you have done much more than I have in the cause of peace. There was a committee in the House last session, and on it I served with my colleagues, CHRISTIANSON, of Minnesota, TOBEY, of New Hampshire, both Republicans, and both distinguished former Governors of their States KLOEB, of Ohio, a Democrat, a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, the author of a very important neutrality bill, and one of the leaders for intelligent action for peace KOPPLEMANN, of Connecticut, SISSON, of New York, MORITZ, of Pennsylvania, all three Democrats, and able, patriotic gentlemen; and SAUTHOFF, of Wisconsin, of the Progressive Party, another courageous fighter for peace. In the Senate among those favoring neutrality we find NYE, of North Dakota, and VANDENBERG, of Michigan, both Republicans CLARK, of Missouri, and BONE, of Washington, both Democrats; and all four serving on the Senate Munitions Committee; and many others. I am not authorized to speak for all or any of these gentlemen, but I mention them as supporters of substantial, strict neutrality. The statement is made, however, so that we understand that our action is nonpartisan.

M'REYNOLDS AND NYE-CLARK-MAVERICK NEUTRALITY BILLS

The distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS], with the support of the administration and State Department, Friday, January 3, 1936, introduced a bill which is a great step forward for the country. While the McReynolds bill was being written, some of us were writing another, and it was introduced Monday at noon in the Senate by NYE and CLARK; in the House by me. This bill was introduced because we believe the administration bill has certain loopholes, although essentially a good bill; and the bill, called by the press the Nye-Clark-Maverick bill is of the strictest and most mandatory type.

Let me mention mandatory neutrality and the various concepts of neutrality, because the words have caused some misconceptions in the minds of the people.

Now, the old conception of neutrality allowed the neutral to profit by a war. Not only could such a nation trade with the belligerents, as it did before the war, but it could increase its exports a hundredfold to either belligerent that was in a position to buy; it could profit by the war both in the greater volume of its shipments and in the higher prices paid.

It was this increase in war trade over the normal trade of peacetimes that constituted the principal economic entanglements that so often dragged the neutral into the war in the end.

Now, let us take neutrality under the new conception, or the conception to be established by written law of the United States of America. It is that the Nation should not make war profits on belligerents, and should have as little as possible to do with these belligerents. This will necessitate an embargo on munitions of war, or implements of war, and many other restrictions on foreign trade and commerce. But frankly, wars in general, the World War in particular, from a very cold-blooded, practical, business viewpoint, considering also the unconscionable profits, are certainly not worth the candle. The human lives lost will not be regained—nor will the eleven or so billions of dollars which we loaned to the Allies.

WORLD WAR MISTAKES

Continuing with the idea of neutrality, we might here make some immediate comparisons. In the World War we were never neutral from its begininng, even according to the old conception, nor were our neutral rights ever respected from the beginning, according to the old definition of neutrality. If we look at the columns of the newspapers of that day we find that we immediately sided with the Allies, or the British and French Governments, emotionally, physically, and financially. Under the abuse of the German Government we protested against their submarine campaign. And the British Government very cleverly controlled its own propaganda—but it also violated American rights and seized our ships on the high seas. England blockaded Germany and would not let us sell to Germany. So we sold to England, upon the theory I presume—even though millions of our fellow human beings were losing their lives with products "Made in America"—that we were making great profits.

Now, there is no sense in blaming the whole thing on J. P. Morgan and Wall Street. I probably have the same opinion of J. P. and the Street as the average person, but the American people—and you and I—should not always excuse ourselves and blame everything on one individual or one group of individuals. We Americans have a habit of blaming someone else to save ourselves from realities—of thinking. We should consider our own conduct in that particular. It is true that the people of this country were finally pushed into the war by propaganda. But we went, and that is the point. It is true that newspaper propaganda constantly dinned in the ears of the American people stories about the atrocities of the Germans—and combined with the fact that we were not neutral from the first, along with the lending by our international bankers of hundreds of millions of other people's money, finally put us in the war. Then we beat the tom-toms of hate, played our bands, and as a nation lent more of our money to send our own flesh and blood into the pot of death, to collect the same thing—money!

WAR BLOODY CIRCLE OF HUMAN BLINDNESS

Then we loaned billions more so the munitions makers could get the cash, all of which will have to be paid by the common taxpayers of the United States. Then, after we had gone through this foolish and criminal policy of having set up huge paper profits, and having lost our blood and brawn on foreign battlefields, we lost the billions of dollars in addition. If this is not a crazy and bloody circle of human blindness, I do not know what it is. Why, I cannot see any sense in war from any angle whatsoever.

Mr. Speaker, let me sum up, and repeat a little, for we must understand clearly what is meant by the old idea of neutrality and the new idea of neutrality. The old idea was for us to have political isolation, but to be right in on the economic game of sending our ships across the seas, to sell all manner of merchandise and products to the belligerents in their business of killing. And so, having entered in that manner, we finally joined the conflict politically and in a military way, and got into the big business of killing, too. That was the history of the World War, as of the War of 1812. But the new idea is that we must not merely stay out of trouble politically but also economically; that we must not only avoid political and military entanglements but economic entanglements as well.

Now, in writing any law we must make our intentions clear, and Congress cannot evade responsibility by writing a blank check.

NYE-CLARK-MAVERICK BILL COVERS SITUATION

Therefore, in writing this proposed neutrality law, we have set down certain limitations, specifically, in clear, plain language, and these governmental executives, including the Chief Executive, merely follow the law, as they do any other law, and as is their duty.

Simply speaking, I believe the bill which I introduced Monday in the House, and which Senators NYE and CLARK simultaneously introduced in the Senate, covers the situation. Let me describe this bill in ordinary language.

First of all, the law itself sets out that it is necessary in the absence of international agreements, and is enacted pending new agreements that will insure peace, justice, and equality among the nations. I mention this so that all must know that the author's attitude is not that of a bitter isolationist, but for neutrality under the conditions of the world today. Also, it is obviously impracticable to even talk about the League of Nations or World Court right now. Some day our country may have peace by international action, and I hope we shall, but it would be obviously impossible for the machinery of international organization to be set up in the short time now available.

But to go on with the bill: It seeks to establish neutrality and peace, as I have tried to show you, and specifically in section 2 creates a flat, outright embargo on arms to all belligerents in any war. Section 3 is the real controversial part which gives the President the right to put definite quotas on such things as he finds to be materials or products considered war necessities, on a basis of the annual average of the past 5 years. I am not, myself, very well pleased with this section, but the consensus of opinion is that since it was abnormal or increased business that got us in the last war, that if ordinary business is held to normal no one can complain for loss of it at home, nor can a foreign nation complain. Besides, the other sections of the bill rather fully protect us, especially due to the fact that in sections 9 and 10 loans are automatically forbidden to belligerents upon the outbreak of war, and no extension can be granted on commercial credits. These sections comply with the Securities and Exchange Commission and Federal Reserve Board laws and regulations. It can be safely said that if this law had been in effect before the World War that we may never have gone in it; certainly, however, it is safe to say that with this law we will have better chances to stay out of any present or future war.

The point is, a belligerent could not go very far if we stop the flotation of loans, and do not allow any extension over the first 90 days or 6 months of credit. Other sections concern the prohibition of American vessels from proceeding to belligerent ports, or travelling in hostile waters; certain prohibition of travel; and the power of the President to forbid the departure of vessels from our ports and to restrict our ports from the use of submarines, or the misuse by foreign nations of our flag in shipping.

Well, Mr. Speaker and colleagues, you just about have the picture. The prospects for the enactment of a satisfactory law on neutrality look good. Let us work together to that end.

And for the Nation as a whole, let none of us get excited, nor lose our tempers, but be patient and sensible. Remember, if war comes, we are through, and civilization is through—finished. There is nothing to gain in war—and everything to lose. Since all we can possibly gain is suffering, misery, and death, let us fight for neutrality and peace.

THE FARMER'S ENEMY

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including an article on the Constitution and the Supreme Court written by Senator WILLIAM E. BORAH.

The SPEAKER. Is there objetcion to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article by Senator WILLIAM E. BORAH, of Idaho, from Collier's Magazine:

[From Collier's for Feb. 1, 1936]

THE FARMER'S ENEMY

By WILLIAM E. BORAH, United States Senator from Idaho

Where is the American farmer to find the market upon which alone depends his permanent prosperity? Is there a market? If so, where is it?

Whatever virtues there were in the Agricultural Adjustment Act as an emergency proposition, it did not seem to me a permanent solution of the tragedy of the American farm.

Mr. Freestone, the able master of the State Grange of the State of New York, according to the press, recently stated: "We hope that some of the experiments sincerely made in the cause of agriculture will be successful, but in the long run, on a permanent basis, government cannot save agriculture. * * * When the present emergency is over * * * when the end of experimentation comes, the organizations (farm organizations) will see new opportunities to grow in the service of agriculture."

This, I suspect, represents the views of the vast majority of the American farmers.

Notwithstanding the hog vote, the wheat vote, and all other votes, the farmer does not like regimentation. He takes it because it is the only help that has been offered him in an almost indescribably distressing situation. Those who picture the farmer as anxious to let his acres lie idle and wait for his check, in my opinion, know little about his real views. He is less in love with bureaucracy than anyone in the United States. Instinctively he wants to run his farm which his own industry has carved out of perhaps a desert; he wants to enlarge and to improve. He likes to add to his acreage, his herd; and he rejoices to see things grow—"multiply and replenish the earth."

But he had seen the debenture which the Grange had urged for 50 years killed. The Tariff Act of 1929, as it passed the Senate, provided for the issuance of debenture certificates to farmers exporting farm commodities equal to the amount of the duty upon such commodities.

These certificates issued to the farmer exporting his commodities were to be redeemed by the Secretary of the Treasury under proper rules and regulations. He had seen the pledge broken by which he was to be given equality of treatment under the tariff. He had seen his dollar, when measured in the commodity of his production, cut in half, and his taxes, interest, and debts in the meantime increasing. So he consented to reduce acreage and to kill his pigs—something which he deplores far more than do those who criticize him for doing so.

FORCED TO REGIMENTATION

Give the farmer a fair market—a market in which he can realize the cost of production with resonable profits—and he will return the check, take back the idle acres, fight for the life of his pigs, and chase away the first representative of bureaucracy appearing at his barn gate with a pitchfork. But until he is given a market he must take regimentation in order, as he hopes, to save his farm, his home, and afford a chance in life to his children. You cannot blame him for accepting the only program offered, however distasteful it seemed, to afford, as he feels, a chance, if not to pull through, at least to exist.

It is a truism, of course, to say that prosperity for agriculture depends upon an enlarged market. But it is a truism which is greatly disregarded. Refinancing of farm indebtedness is, of course, important. Reduction of taxes and cheaper freight rates are likewise important. But the fundamental and determining factor is that of increased and increasing demands for the products of the farm. Can this demand be created? Can this market be found? The demand is at hand; that we know. I feel the market can be made available. And, fortunately, in making this market available we will at the same time be serving the cause of humanity and strengthening our entire political structure. In other words, insofar as we serve the cause of social justice we serve the cause of agriculture by furnishing a market.

WE CAN'T LOOK ABROAD

It appears doubtful whether we shall realize anything like what we seem to hope for in the matter of a foreign market. Everything indicates we are not going to find any considerable demand abroad for our agricultural products. I do not mean to say that we should not by all practical and reasonable means seek to enlarge our foreign market. And to this end the debenture system will probably be of more service than anything which has been suggested. But at best the foreign market will take care of a very small percentage of the products from the farm. In normal times only about 18 percent of farm income is represented by exports. We may not be able to maintain even that percentage.

We know that it has been the policy of all nations, particularly since the World War, to increase all agricultural output. It is estimated that some 50,000,000 acres have been put under cultivation since the armistice. Backward countries with fertile soil and abundance of cheap labor are supplying and building up production to such an extent that it not only reduces the demand for American products but actually threatens to invade, in fact is invading, our domestic market. It would seem that the only market for the American farmer is here in the United States, at his very door. And it seems to me that under a sound economic system that market is ample to insure, in connection with a fair system of refinancing farm indebtedness and a just tax policy, return of prosperity to American agriculture. I say a return of prosperity. The time has been so long that perhaps I should say insure prosperity to American agriculture.

I suppose we ought to gage our farm problem by normal years rather than years of depression. It would greatly simplify the problem if it should be ascertained that in normal years the farmer was prosperous or even fairly prosperous, and that his trouble came only with the general depression. But if we ascertain that in so-called prosperous years we still had a most serious condition on the farm we will be able better to determine the seriousness of the problem, the nature of it, and possibly the solution of it.

What are the facts? The present income of the farm is about $7,300,000,000. It has been augmented since 1932 to the extent of about $1,963,000,000. I am not now subtracting anything by reason of increase in the price of the things the farmer must buy. For the purpose of this article, we may credit the income with the full amount above indicated. But here is the real problem—not how much we have been able to add to an impossible minimum such as that of 1932, but what have we done or can we do to add to the income to which I now call attention. In 1928–29 the income of the farm was $11,941,000,000. The relevant question, therefore, is, What was the condition of agriculture at the time it had an income in excess of the present income to the extent of $4,641,000,000?

A PROBLEM WE'VE ALWAYS HAD

The income, in other words, at the present time of the American farm is about 63 percent of the average income from 1923 to 1929. The question, therefore, is, Did this income bring prosperity to agriculture during these years? If not, can we hope to bring prosperity by curtailing production, or shall we look for enlarging and increasing markets? We know that during the years from 1923 to 1929 mortgages were increased and enlarged and foreclosed. Tax sales in agricultural regions were common. At the Republican convention in Kansas City in 1928 the farmers marched in a body from adjoining States to make known their distressed condition.

Our farm problem did not come with the depression. It was here in a most aggravated form during the years which have been designated as years of prosperity. If the trouble on the farm had commenced with the depression, we might well hope that when we get back to the "favorable" condition of 1929 the farm problem will disappear. But it will not disappear under circumstances similar to those years. In fact, I ask when has there been prosperity on the farm during recent years except in times of war or in case of crop failures on a large scale in other countries? It is instructive to go back over the history of agriculture and learn how rarely the farmer has been prosperous in recent decades except when war or famine gave him a market. The farm question has its roots in conditions other than those superinduced by general depression.

It will not be contended that from 1923 to 1929 the farmer was at fault. He had produced and was prepared, assuming the American people could buy, to feed the American people, pay his taxes, high as they were, pay his interest, high as it was, reduce his mortgage and, keeping step to the music of the seasons' change, reseed and replant his acres. Assuming that the American people could buy! But, badly as many needed to buy, they could not buy. A proud, strong people were by the millions without the means to supply their tables with more than the bare necessities of life, and millions more were not able to provide even the bare necessities of life. The farmer had not overproduced, measured by the needs of the people; he had not curtailed production or limited output; he had not, through agreements, fixed the price of his products. He had gone forward and produced sufficient to make comfortable all the people of the land and in doing so had discharged his full duty to himself, to humanity, and to his country. No family need go unfed and no child go undernourished on account of the failure of the farmer to produce. And yet he was producing for a people, taken as a whole, with a fabulous national income. The trouble was, this income had been so distributed that 80,000,000 people must confine their purchases to the bare necessities of life and 50,000,000 be satisfied with far less. Here is where the difficulty arose.

A LIBEL ON CIVILIZATION

It now appears that if from 1923 to 1929 all the families in the United States had been able to purchase sufficient to bring them up even to the standard of bare necessities, our practical capacity production in this country would not have been sufficient to meet the consumptive demand. It would seem, wittingly or unwittingly, that the farmer was producing on the theory that every family in the country would have at least the bare necessities of life. Thus this economic crisis in the life of the farm has not only revealed the tragedy of the farm but the tragedy of the Nation, to wit: must we submit and be reconciled to the cruel and enigmatical theory that the natural, normal workings and processes of economic system lead inevitably to meager existence for the millions and incalculable plenty for the hundreds? Must we accept that as the normal, modern civilization for which we have been striving? It seems to me a libel upon civilization. There can be no basis in reason or in justice in 20 percent of the income-earning portion of our population enjoying 98 percent of its savings, leaving the balance, 2 percent, to be divided among the other 80 percent of the population. Such is not an orderly, natural result of modern civilization but a result brought about through practices resting at last upon nothing less than extortion and violence.

With anything like an equitable distribution of our national income, with such a distribution as would have naturally followed had there been no use of unfair and illegal practices, there would have been no distress on the farm. But there was distress on the farm, and there will be until a more equitable distribution takes place. There will not only be trouble ahead for agriculture but profound trouble for all, as there is at this present time. Such conditions simply cannot continue. And the more debts we incur, the more taxes we impose in an effort to counteract the effects of such inequity, the deeper grow our troubles. It is an old story that the righting of such wrongs must come through the initiative of those who suffer. It never comes from those unacquainted with the discipline of want or the wisdom acquired through self-denial.

THE SOURCE OF TOWNSEND'S STRENGTH

Things are happening under our very eyes which ought to be a warning that these conditions cannot continue. Perhaps the most extraordinary social and political movement in recent years and perhaps in our entire history is the Townsend old-age-pension movement. Within a few months, so rapidly have the teachings of this movement taken hold in the minds of the millions of the people that they now seem to have the balance of political power in a number of States and are boldly bidding for national control. I am not about to discuss whether the scheme is sound or practicable but am considering it only as a barometer of the feeling of a vast number of our law-abiding people. The proposal could well be entitled "Townsend's plan for the redistribution of purchasing power." It is not merely a plan to secure a pension for the aged. These elderly people are in fact to be made the agents to accomplish a much broader and more fundamental thing.

And that fundamental thing is, as they contend, the restoration of purchasing power to the masses. It is their contention that the plan, if put into operation, will bring about an equitable distribution of the national income. This, in my opinion, is the driving, impelling thought behind this movement. Regardless, therefore, of the method, which you may reject as impracticable or unworkable, the movement derives its great strength from the resentment which so many feel and which resentment the movement has summoned to its support.

There is something radically wrong. The basis upon which rests our constitutional scheme of government is that for every wrong there is a remedy. If the concentration of wealth, on the one hand, and the spread of distress, on the other, should continue to develop along the same lines for the next 50 years as it has developed during the last 50 years, just what would be the status of American institutions? We might still call this a republic, but it is doubtful if we would even pay that tribute of respect to republican institutions.

NO MAGIC IN TAXING

In dealing with this problem there are some things we cannot do. We cannot confiscate and we ought not to repudiate. We cannot take the property of A and turn it over to B, C, and D. And if we did so under our present system A would soon have it all back again. We cannot distribute wealth or establish equitable income through the process of taxing power. Assuming that by such methods we could break down large estates, no substantial benefit would flow to the people. The sums gathered through taxation stop at bureaus and would be consumed by unnecessary officials, resulting in mere extravagance and waste. The distribution would get very little beyond the demands of those operating the Government. Taxes should be levied solely for the purpose of taking care of the necessary expense of the Government.

I fully understand that when you come to discuss the concentration of wealth and the monopolistic practices or methods by which it has been brought about and by which it is maintained, it is argued, and with an air of divine finality, that you cannot turn back the clock. For myself I am not proposing to turn back the clock. I am not proposing to take from anyone the fruits of industry, of ability, of genius. If through superior ability a better article is made, if through greater efficiency a business wins its way to the market, no one has a right to complain. On the other hand, that is in the interest of consumers, provided the way is still open to compete on the basis of merit and efficiency. The people get the benefit of a better article at lower prices; and the channels of trade remain open to those who may still further produce better articles at lower prices.

GETTING THE BENEFIT

This principle has been well illustrated by the motor vehicle industry. When the depression was at its worst this industry was at its best in many ways. Its engineering and experimental departments took on new life. They did not get together and agree upon prices for the same old cars. They did not come to the Congress begging for subsidies. They devoted their efforts to solving their problems in the open field of competition. The result was the companies won out and the people got better cars at lower prices. Under a monopolistic regime, under a price-fixing agreement, under a price-fixing combine the companies might have pulled through, but the public would have been riding around in the same old singing "Lizzie" at perhaps a higher price. It is in the field of competition that industry and genius win and the people get the benefit of the victory.

Justice Brandeis (before he became a member of the Supreme Court) declared that: "Experience has taught us that competition is never suppressed by the greater efficiency of one concern. It is suppressed by agreement to form a monopoly or by those excesses of competition which are designed to crush a rival. . . . No business has been so superior to its competitors in the process of manufacture or of distribution as to enable it to control the market solely by reason of its superiority. There are no natural monopolies in the industrial world."

QUESTIONS OF ETHICS

Is it turning back the clock to say that in the business world there shall be no squeezing out of a beginner, no discrimination against retailers who buy from a rival, no holding back of raw material, no secret agreements or arrangements against a rival, no threats against concerns who sell supplies to a rival, no agreement to impose prices upon the people regardless of the value of the goods sold? Is it turning back the clock to say that thuggery is as intolerable on the highways of commerce as it is on the highways of travel? Have we reached the point where it can be said that overreaching or illegal practices under a corporate charter are less amenable to law and the public interest than over-reaching or illegal practices at the country store?

TOWARD PERMANENT RECOVERY

If capitalism is going to insist upon a code of conduct free from all principles of fair and honest dealing, if it is going to insist that the creed of the underworld, where cunning and deceit and ruthlessness and finally extermination are recognized as the law of life, shall be and must be the rule of capitalism, we must be prepared to meet the question of state socialism or even communism. I venture to prophesy that the people will not indefinitely permit private interests to fix prices either directly or indirectly. If they are to be fixed, they will be fixed by public authority. If capitalism has nothing to say in the way of a more equitable distribution of the earnings of capitalism, if it is going to insist that widespread poverty in the midst of incalculable wealth, that denial of the comforts and conveniences of the modern world for the majority of the people are natural and inevitable, then capitalism must be prepared to fight for its very existence.

But is all this true? Are these things a result of natural and normal development? It does not seem to me to be so. Monopoly does not exist as a result of natural growth. It is a result of practices which between man and man no one would defend, practices definable in the law and punishable by law and enforced at little cost when compared to the cost and exertion put forth in an effort to counteract the effect of monopoly. It is much easier to define or specify those practices by which vast aggregations of economic power have been built up than it is to define or specify the practices by which the professional racketeer preys upon the public. Woodrow Wilson once declared: "I take my stand absolutely on a proposition that private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable. Any decently equipped lawyer can suggest to you statutes by which the whole business can be stopped."

We come back to the point from which we started, and that is the first primary step toward permanent farm recovery—the restoration and maintenance of farm prices for farm products. To do that a market must be found. Louis J. Taber, master of the National Grange, speaking at Sacramento, Calif., November last, declared: "There can be no permanent recovery and no return to prosperity until we increase mass purchasing power, until we raise our standard of living, and until there is a better and broader distribution of the wealth we all create. Real Americans have no desire to take away the property that honestly belongs to others. But red-blooded Americans demand for every man that is willing to work the right to acquire the comforts of life."

AN EXCLUSIVE MARKET

The market which we must have is not in Europe nor anywhere else in the Old World. Those markets are ours only upon a very limited scale. It is here in the United States, in the homes of millions of common people, that our markets must be found. And they can never be found until we restore purchasing power to these people. You can never restore purchasing power while private interests through combinations and agreements fix prices. The farm purchasing problem, therefore, has its roots in the most profound problem in our whole social structure.

I conclude by saying that it would seem beyond debate that this home market belongs exclusively to the American farmer to the full extent of his ability to supply it. There can be no sound argument, it would seem, to support the contention that this market is to be divided with foreign producers so long as the American farmer is anxious and able to supply our demand.

THE MOST URGENT DEMAND

If it be said that we must let in foreign farm products in order that we may find a market for our manufactured goods, the answer seems to me to be that the finest market in the world for the American manufacturer is prosperous American agriculture. The farmer is the best of buyers when he has the means with which to buy. His fences, his barns, his granaries, his home, and the clothing and schooling of his children, so long in need of what the American manufacturer has to sell, constitute the most urgent demand anywhere to be found.

Thomas B. Reed once said: "If we propose to abandon any industries, we had better not let it be the agricultural industries. Our system of protection is not for manufacturers alone. It is for farmers also. Whoever deprives our farmers of all the American market they can occupy is false to his principles and must meet with defeat, or the system must be surrendered which proclaims that American markets are first of all for American citizens, who are engaged in developing the country we already have."

THE TOWNSEND PLAN

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remorks in the RECORD by including a few remarks I have made on the Townsend plan.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement made by me with reference to the Townsend plan:

[From the Allegan Gazette of Dec. 19, 1935]

HOFFMAN REVIEWS THE TOWNSEND PLAN—EXPOSES ITS FALLACIES AND INIQUITIES—THOUSANDS TRY TO COERCE CONGRESSMEN—WILL NOT STAND IT—MAN AND WIFE EACH COULD DRAW $200 EVERY MONTH

A recent publication of a Nation-wide movement carried this statement: "It is now the open hunting season for Congressmen."

Evidently the author of this statement has not been reading the daily papers the last few years. Since the time of Edward Larue Hamilton, who so greatly honored this district, who was a statesman, and one of the last who had opportunity to be such without being continually beset by organizations of his district, more and more Congressmen have been, in the most humiliating sense of the word, servants of their districts.

But the situation has changed far beyond that where a Congressman is permitted to represent his district having in mind his country. Today and for some years past he has been an errand boy of special groups, cajoled or threatened, as a particular group might consider most advantageous to their own interest.

The process has continued and spread until he not only receives requests, demands, and threats to do, or to refrain from doing, a particular thing, from organizations and groups but from individuals who presume to tell him that he now represents the writer or the speaker, and that unless he acts in accordance with that writer's or speaker's demands he will not be returned to office.

Today some farm leaders insist that the benefits conferred by the A. A. A. are but protection similar to that afforded manufacturers and labor by a protective tariff. In part he is right; in part he is in error; for the check laid upon the table of the farmer for not producing hogs, corn, wheat, or any other product is a direct and immediate payment, which does not prevent foreign competition; which rather, in view of recent figures, increases that competition and results, not alone in a higher price to the consumer, as does the protective tariff on manufactured articles, but it results in a scarcity of the things the consumer eats, wears, and uses.

There is a silver group in Congress which insists that the United States Government purchase silver at a price above the world market, and this upon the theory that silver is necessary to maintain the monetary system of the country.

Just why your money and mine should be used to purchase silver metal at an exorbitant price; that is, at a price above its market value, is a thing which I have never been able to fathom, although I clearly understand why western silver producers are in favor of such a program.

And so the list of those seeking special benefits, special privileges, might be extended almost indefinitely. I might refer to the loans which were made upon cotton which gave to the cotton growers of the South an immediate and indefinite advantage over the producers of any other agricultural product.

Attention might be called to the fallacy of these various schemes by pointing out that we have lost the foreign cotton market, that we have lost our foreign market for agricultural products, while at the same time we have failed to bring about prosperity.

The demand that a Congressman vote for appropriations is almost irresistible and, if he yielded to all of these demands made by each particular group, the staggering total would throw us into immediate bankruptcy.

It was in the closing days of the Congress when bills for the appropriation of money for this, that, and the other things was being put through without due consideration that JAMES P. BUCHANAN, a loyal Democrat from Texas, but who places country above party, arose and solemnly warned his Democratic colleagues that Congress had already appropriated $10,000,000,000 and that to continue meant disaster. It was he who more recently, consulting with the President, informed the Executive in no unmistakable terms that there must be a halt.

It is in Washington that the taxpayers' money is being poured out as though it were of no more value and were as limitless as the grains of sand along the shores of Lake Michigan.

If you consider, you will be shocked to learn that between the 31st day of August 1935 and the 31st day of October 1935, 26,169 employees have been added to the pay roll of the Federal Government.

You know, but you do not realize, the effect of the fact that in October alone 1,830 new employees or officials went on the Federal pay roll.

You do not have in mind that while the income of our country from 1930 until the end of 1932 dropped until it was a little above $2,000,000,000, expenditures increased from four billion to approximately five and one-half billion.

From the end of 1932 on, Government receipts gradually and consistently rose until they were, in the middle of 1935, approximately four and one-half billion, while expenditures increased from five and one-half billion to seven and one-half billion.

We forget that if a man earned $24 per minute it would take him 2,000 years to earn the money the Government has spent in the last 3 years.

With all this spending we now have sweeping over this country the grandest spending scheme of all, the so-called Townsend plan. Fired with a fervor similar to that of the religious fanatic, many of the subscribers to this plan believe it to be ordained of God as a device which will end poverty and suffering and bring about the millenium.

For those faithful souls, those honest citizens, who so sincerely believe, we all rightly have the greatest sympathy and charity. For those leaders who are profiting by this plan, who are collecting the nickels and the dimes—yes; the quarters—from those who, as a class, have the least of this world's goods, we should have but the greatest contempt and scorn.

All over this country—and I have in mind no particular spot—we have going about a horde of men lecturing, seeking office on a platform which includes the Townsend plan. These men are opportunists. They are capitalizing upon the strength of a great popular movement, a movement which has for its avowed object the highly laudable and justifiable purpose of alleviating suffering and increasing happiness, but which is impracticable and, as outlined, unjust and illegal.

Briefly, let us examine this plan, and that there may be no mistake, let me read from a petition presented to me as a Representative of the Fourth District:

"The undersigned citizens of the United States request you to introduce in the Congress of the United States at your earliest opportunity the following bills and use your utmost effort to obtain their passage into law:

"First. A bill obligating the Government of the United States to pay every citizen of said Government whose record is free of habitual criminality and who has attained the age of 60 years a monthly pension of $200 until the end of his or her life upon the sole condition that he or she retires from all further business or profession for gain, and agrees, under oath, to spend the entire amount of the pension within the confines of the United States during the current month in which it is received.

"Second. A bill creating a Nation-wide Federal transactions tax calculated at a rate sufficiently high to produce the revenue necessary to meet the requirements of bill no. 1."

Here you have the first proposition; and now listen and tell me if there be a man among you who can honestly and conscientiously agree to the foregoing. Think! This is a request to pass a law to pay every citizen whose record is free from habitual criminality and who has attained the age of 60 years a monthly pension of $200 until the end of his life upon certain conditions.

This pension goes not alone to the needy of 60 years of age, but it goes to those who possess incomes amounting even into the millions, if they so desire. The man, the woman, who has sufficient to live upon in comfort and in luxury, under the terms of this law, would draw the $200 per month. Am I in error?

On the 4th day of February 1935 I sat in the committee room of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, composed of 21 Members, and I heard Dr. Townsend, the author of this plan, testify, under oath, as follows:

"Mr. HILL (member of the committee). Now, regardless of the income, from whatever source received, any citizen of the United States receiving that income, who is over the age of 60 years, would be entitled to the $200 per month pension.

"Dr. TOWNSEND. Yes. I agree to that.

"Mr. HILL. That would, of course, include the wealthy people as well as the classes of people all down the line, all the way down to those who are in a state of poverty.

"Dr. TOWNSEND (p. 685). We agree that the plan shall be nondiscriminatory and applied to all citizens equally.

"Mr. HILL. In other words, it would apply to John D. Rockefeller, Sr., to Henry Ford, to J. P. Morgan, as well as to a man who has no means or income at all?

"Dr. TOWNSEND. If they wish to acquire the pension under the provisions of the act.

"Mr. HILL. That is, they would be eligible.

"Dr. TOWNSEND. Yes."

On page 733 of the same record, Mr. Hudson, one of the experts produced by Dr. Townsend, and by whose side he sat at the time he was giving his testimony, was asked by Mr. VINSON, of the committee:

"Would you not include Mr. Andrew Mellon as a beneficiary under this bill, he being past the 60 years of age?

"Mr. HUDSON. Absolutely."

Yet the Townsendites tell me today—and they have been telling me for weeks past—that I was committing political suicide because I would not subscribe to a bill which, regardless of need or income, provides a pension of $200 per month to the wealthy, the well-to-do, as well as to those in moderate circumstances or in need—an outrageous demand which they have made upon me, which they make upon every Congressman; and their battle cry is, "An open hunting season upon Congressmen."

What magic is there in the figure of $200 per month? I have written to many of them, asking them whether they would not be satisfied with $50, $100, $150, $175; and many, many times the answer has been, "No; we want, we demand, $200 per month, and we propose to have it; and if we do not get it, we'll get a revolving Congressman; we'll get a Congressman who will give it to us."

What is the $200 to be spent for? Myself, 60 years of age, with a wife of equal age, we would be entitled, under the provisions of this law, if I merely practiced law as amusement or gratuitously to assist my boys, who are both with me, to $4,800 per year. Owning our own home in Allegan, with a garden, fruit trees, and a few chickens, we can easily live upon $800 and live in comfort. That would give us $4,000 to spend, and for what should we use it? Would we refuse to take it? Is that human nature? How many would?

All those eligible will take it, spend it, and, if they cannot use the things purchased, give them to others, thus lessening the purchasing capacity of those others.

This question of what the money should be spent for interested some members of the committee, and so Dr. Townsend was asked, and you will find this on page 687 of the record:

"Mr. HILL. I take it, of course, he would have to spend it in good faith, even though he spent it for luxuries. He could not go out and squander it in order to get rid of it, so that he may be eligible to receive $200 the next month?

"Dr. TOWNSEND. Why not? We do not care what he does with it. That is immaterial. Let him have carte blanche."

And church folk, members of religious organizations, you drys who are behind this movement (and remember always that, in Allegan County, I campaigned for the first local option and then prohibition), listen to the rest of his reply:

"Let him buy whisky with it if he wants to kill himself off as quickly as he chooses. That is immaterial. It is commerce—business—that we want in this country. We are not going to regulate people's morals in the least when we give them this money to spend."

So I am threatened with political disaster, as is every other Congressman who refuses to give to every person over 60 and who is not a habitual criminal, who is a citizen of the United States, $200 per month, provided he spends it each month.

In favor of an old-age pension, in favor of social security, yes; but in favor of accepting Dr. Townsend and his satellites as my political boss, no; never!

Unhappy indeed is the state of those Democrats, or, rather, those New Dealers, who have been characterized as rubber stamps and who are now, the country over, subjects of scorn and ridicule, lacking the respect of right-thinking citizens.

How contemptible, how lacking in manhood must be the man who will abrogate his right to think, to reason, to form judgment, and agree in advance in order to obtain office to follow the arbitrary direction of a man who lives in the other extreme of the United States; and adopt a plan which we know to be unfair, unjust, unreasonable, and unconstitutional, for any plan; and, mark this well, enacted into law, which does as does this plan, give to one group of citizens regardless of their need an arbitrary sum collected from another group, will never stand the test of the Supreme Court of the United States. It works hardship upon every other citizen who is not the recipient of its benefit. It collects from him a tax amounting to from 2 to 42 percent, for it is a 2-percent transaction—not sales tax, as is so often erroneously assumed.

A bushel of wheat the world around will produce a 48-pound sack of flour. By the time that bushel of wheat gets into the hands of the grocery man and is a sack of flour this plan of Dr. Townsend will add to the cost of that 48-pound sack of flour 10 cents; and this you will find on page 731 of the record.

Not only that, but if this plan goes into effect the farmer who grows the wheat and sells it must take out a license. Perhaps I do not know what I am talking about; but, certainly, Dr. Townsend must know his plan. Let us hear what he said—and you will find this on page 692 of the record:

"Mr. HILL. Suppose a farmer, growing wheat and livestock; he is engaged in the business of selling what he produces as well as in the business of producing these commodities. Would he have to take out a license?

"Dr. TOWNSEND. He certainly would have to take out a license. He is engaged in business—the business of producing commodities for foodstuffs.

"Mr. HILL. Any producer who produces for the purpose of selling products?

"Dr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

"Mr. HILL. Would have to take out his license?

"Dr. TOWNSEND. He would."

And so the farmer's wife who sells eggs, who sells cream, who sells butter, the farmer's boy who sells melons, each and all must take out a license; and each and all must contribute so that someone, whether he needs it or not, can have $200 a month.

Now, the easy way out of this situation for every officeholder, for every candidate for office, is, as it always is when beset by any particular group, to promise to agree to the thing desired whether that promise be made with intention to keep or to violate.

If to illustrate my point I make reference to our President, I ask the forgiveness of my Democratic friends.

In our little town there are a thousand or twelve hundred registered voters. It is said—and no doubt correctly—that at least 500 of them have signed the Townsend petition. That means political defeat to any man who does not agree to their proposition; and so, when I am asked whether I have promised to support the $200 pension at the next session, should not the answer be: "Why, of course; why not?" and accompany it with a wink, the wink meaning, of course, that there are certain reservations.

Might I not explain, "Promises are easy and necessary, but surely in this day and age nobody believes they are made to be kept. You cannot expect me to keep a promise if our President did not."

We all know what the 1932 Democratic platform contained. We all know that the President flew from New York to Chicago to stand squarely upon that platform and to proclaim before the world that he was 100 percent for it. We all know that practically all those promises have been repudiated, thrown into the wastebasket.

Yet the President's popularity, it is said, is undiminished; and why? Simply because he tells us that changed conditions prevented the fulfillment of those promises; and does anyone find fault? Certainly the farmer who receives the Triple A checks, the cotton growers, and all the other long list down the road have no complaint to make. Certainly those thousands upon thousands of new employees placed upon the Federal pay roll are not complaining.

Then, having given my promise, why should I not, to become the fair-haired hero of the Townsendites, as soon as Congress has opened, make a speech in favor of the Townsend plan? Why not with my colleagues join in passing the bill? Why not send it up to the President and have him approve it, and then say to the Townsendites: "Yes; we have done all we can. We have enacted your plan into law." Then, when someone brings it before the Supreme Court and that body declares it—as it will; as it must—to be unconstitutional, because it is unjust and not right, lay the blame upon the Supreme Court?

That is the plan that has been and is being followed—not by Democrats like Al Smith; John W. Davis; Albert C. Ritchie; Senator Byrd, of Virginia; Senator Tydings, of Maryland; Governor Murray, of Oklahoma; Governor Talmadge, of Georgia; Newton D. Baker, former Secretary of War; and Bainbridge Colby, former Secretary of State—but by the New Dealers, who, after all, as said by CARTER GLASS, are not Democrats but are New Dealers first, last, and all the time.

And another out for the Congressman is to support the plan, realizing that if prosperity comes, as ultimately it will, the people will forget about the Townsend plan. That is the broad and the easy way which may lead temporarily to public office, to popularity; but is widely divergent from that straight and narrow road which one must follow if he retains his self-respect, and that is the road which I choose to follow, believing and willing to advocate and to work for any plan which promises security to old age which is reasonable and just, but declining emphatically and absolutely to subscribe to a theory which will work injustice, inequality, and hardship and which in any event must fail because of legal restrictions. These legal restrictions cannot be changed so as to permit of a scheme of this kind, because it is inherently unjust and unreasonable.

In the end, in the long run, our people are fair, they are honest, and they will not stand for oppression or for special privileges to any particular class.

A TREATY NAVY

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a radio address delivered by my colleague the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DORSEY].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DORSEY] delivered October 26, 1935:

In November 1918 a grief-stricken and impoverished civilization, stupefied by the shock of war, turned weary eyes upon a scene of desolation and horror. The battlefields of the world were still crimson with the fresh blood of eight millions of dead. The floors of the seven seas were littered with the hulks of sunken ships manned by ghostly crews. Victor and vanquished alike were sickened of war and the thoughts of war. There existed a general reluctance among the masses even to think of a future conflict, together with a well-defined revolt against the machinery of war. Within the breast of mankind was lodged a solemn pledge that never again should humanity be subjected to the frightful horrors and stark tragedies from which the world had just emerged.

The war-ravaged countries which participated in the World War and those small nations living in eternal dread of powerful neighbors looked with hope upon any scheme designed to establish perpetual peace. As a man awakening from a drunken orgy reaches for a sedative, so these nations, large and small, grasped with eager hands the League of Nations plan of President Wilson.

Never before was man so ready to make a conscientious effort to reduce the instruments and to lessen the probabilities of war.

Despite such auspicious prospects, attempts to reduce the armed forces of the world met with dismal failure. Tremendous technical difficulties obstructed the path. Not only were the implements of war involved, but far-reaching economic problems, smoldering jealousies, and self-preservation were projected into the situation. These destroyed much of the idealism existent in the beginning, despite the well-intentioned efforts of the statesmen of the world.

President Harding, in 1921, realized the spirit then prevalent and hoped that the reduction of naval armaments would prove more susceptible of solution than had the problem of general arms reduction. He, therefore, invited the principal powers to participate in a conference for the limitation of naval forces. At the time this conference assembled, the United States, while still inferior to Great Britain in naval strength, had a definite head start toward absolute preponderance. The naval program of 1916 was well under way. The heavy armor and the mighty guns of the superdreadnaughts, which were to make this country supreme upon the seas, were already assembled in the navy yards. On the ways were being built 10 great battleships. The keels were laid for six swift and powerful battle cruisers, to be the largest vessels of war the world had ever known. Also, in course of construction were 10 light cruisers, as well as numerous submarines and destroyers—a tremendous embryo fleet in itself, which when completed and added to the ships then in service, would have definitely assured to the United States naval supremacy.

After months of preliminary conversations and weeks of bargaining, the Washington Conference was able to arrive at a partial solution of the vexing problem of naval disarmament. In 1922 the Five Powers Treaty was signed limiting the permissible total tonnage of capital ships, that is, ships above 10,000 tons, in the ratio of 5 for Great Britain and the United States, 3 for Japan, and 1.7 for France and Italy. No working agreement was reached restricting either the number or total tonnage of ships of 10,000 tons or less.

For the first time in history the powerful nations of the world had by mutual agreement placed a limit on the size to which their navies could be built, a limit heretofore bounded only by the size of the dockyard forges and the depth of the public purse.

Here was true cause for elation. Never before had such an unprecedented act of conciliation been laid on the altar of international good will.

But behind the altruism and the idealism was a background of shrewd international bargaining. It was a question of give and take, with the United States doing most of the giving. None of the conferees seriously doubted that in an unlimited naval race the United States would far outdistance the others. In its final analysis unlimited naval competition became a question of dollars and cents, with the United States holding the purse strings of the world. More than this, the glowing forges and continuous sound of rivet hammers in the shipyards gave abundant proof of a determination to win the race. Faced with inevitable defeat in such a competition, the other nations were determined to salvage for themselves such advantage as was possible. Japan was frankly loath to accept the apparent inferiority of the 5-to-3 ratio and consented only after the inducement of the Pacific nonfortification agreement was written into the treaty. Great Britain honestly bemoaned the loss of her historic preponderance at sea. Patriotic and conservative Britons felt that in some way the Empire could and should have found a method to overtop our partially completed 1916 building program.

As a result of this treaty, only 3 of the 10 battleships then building were completed and none of the mighty battle cruisers. Of the latter, two were converted into aircraft carriers, of which the United States at that time had only one, an old collier, converted for use as an experimental carrier.

The year following the ratification of the Washington Treaty, by which we renounced naval supremacy, President Harding issued a prophetic warning to the American people. He said:

"It is covenanted, in international honor, that our Navy shall retain the first rank, and any failure at retention must be charged to ourselves, because the world has deliberately acknowledged the righteousness of our front-rank position."

The years following brought forth a situation not contemplated by the treaty and yet not unpredictable. Restricted in larger vessels, foreign naval powers launched upon an intensive program of construction of fighting ships while American naval shipbuilding atrophied.

During the 8 years following the Washington Treaty the United States laid down 8 cruisers, 3 submarines, and no destroyers; Great Britain, 15 cruisers, 19 submarines, and 22 destroyers; Japan, 15 cruisers, 35 submarines, and 47 destroyers; France, 8 cruisers, 67 submarines, and 48 destroyers; Italy, 6 cruisers, 32 submarines, and 37 destroyers; or, expressed in total number of these 3 types of vessels which were not limited by treaty, the United States laid down 11; Great Britain, 56; Japan, 97; France, 103; and Italy, 75.

An attempt in 1927 at Geneva to extend the restrictions to all classes of naval vessels proved an utter failure. At Washington we lead in the race. By relinquishing that lead we achieved a partial success. At Geneva we lagged, but the leaders would not stop and wait for us.

Disarmament by example had proved an illusion. If there be today those who still believe in the efficacy of this method, let them but look at the standing armies of the world. Has our example deterred in the least the 12 countries with vastly larger armies? Did our failure to build to treaty limitation stop foreign naval building? In the light of recent events abroad, bold indeed would be the theorist who advocated further concessions to the exploded ideal of disarmament by example.

Following the fiasco at Geneva, Congress in 1929 authorized the construction of 15 cruisers. We dared not lag further in the race, but even had these vessels been completed we would still have been below the ratios established at Washington. These potential cruisers were considered abroad sufficiently significant to resume further negotiations for the limitation of naval vessels not formerly restricted by the Washington Treaty.

The following year, at London, an agreement was drawn up providing for limitation of naval vessels not previously restricted. Whereas at Washington, America led from strength, at London we followed from weakness. To none of the conferees were the compromises finally reached satisfactory. France and Italy rejected them entirely, America, Japan, and Great Britain reluctantly ratified the agreement only because it seemed preferable to no treaty at all.

Twelve years after the World War limitation of naval armaments of all categories had become an accomplished fact, at least among the three principal naval powers.

Four years later, in December 1934, Japan's denunciation of the Washington and London Treaties wiped out the fruit of all these labors. Unless by some unforeseen miracle the treaties should be renewed in a final conference, limitation of naval armaments will, on the 1st of January 1937, become only another experiment, noble in purpose but apparently impossible of enforcement. On that date, with all restrictions as to size or number of ships removed, maritime nations will be free to build, each to its concept of its own peculiar needs.

What, then, shall we do with this new-found freedom? What will others do? Will 1937 mark the beginning of a new post-war naval race?

For others we cannot answer, but for ourselves these questions demand an immediate answer, an answer based on sound decisions, not of the moment but for the long years to come.

Greatness in arms and authority in council are not achievements of a season's growth. The diplomatic problems of the day may yield to the solutions of the day, but our naval position, once lost, cannot readily be regained. No millions of citizens springing to arms can replace the sure bulwark of a permanent fleet. Failure to maintain an adequate navy would be a folly to be equaled only by engaging in unrestricted building competition. For America the pathway leads along the firm middle ground. So long have the present relative treaty positions existed that they have come to be regarded as a fixed structure of naval policy, and it is along this established treaty level—no more, no less—that our future points.

Fortunately, we are today headed toward this goal. Disarmament by example, during the post-Washington Treaty period had reduced our Navy to such a point that at the London Conference one of the American delegates was astonished to find how "hopelessly inferior" was the American Navy.

When the present administration came into power in March 1933 our President announced as his policy "To build the Navy up to treaty strength", and with characteristic energy and ability proceeded to carry out his announced policy. He faced a Herculean task—to remedy the neglect of 12 long years was not a task to be lightly undertaken. Though much remains yet to be done, today the end is in sight.

The Congress wisely provided in the Vinson-Trammell bill not only for building the Navy to treaty strength but of more importance still for maintaining it there. Under the provisions of this bill the Navy will by 1942 have attained full treaty strength. It behooves each peace-loving American citizen who, with an abiding faith in the righteousness of our cause, believes that an adequate Navy is a sure shield behind which we may rejoice in the isolation of our position and in our aloofness from foreign embroilments to give active and wholehearted support to a "Treaty Navy, fully manned and fully ready."

THE MONEY SYSTEM

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks by inserting an address delivered by me at the Seventeenth Annual Convention of the American Farm Bureau Federation in Chicago on December 10, 1935.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address delivered by me at the Seventeenth Annual Convention of the American Farm Bureau Federation in Chicago, Ill., on December 10, 1935:

When I received from your president, Mr. Edward A. O'Neal, your invitation to speak at this gathering I immediately told him how glad I would be to be with you all and discuss with you matters of national interest.

Mr. O'Neal told me to talk about "The honest dollar", and before I begin to discuss the subject I want to warn you in advance that everyone who talks about money thinks that he or she knows all about it.

The different opinions about what should be done remind me of the occasion when Isadora Duncan, the famous Russian dancer, wrote a letter to George Bernard Shaw, the distinguished social philosopher. Miss Duncan, beautiful in form and feature, wrote Mr. Shaw, angular in form and plain of feature, suggesting that they marry and have a child, and that this youngster, with her magnificent body and his wonderful brain, would be the most remarkable child ever born. Mr. Shaw answered the lady and thanked her very much for the compliment she was apparently attempting to pay him, but suggested that she consider the possibility that if they married and had a child it might have his body and her brain, and what a mess that would be.

There is another class who realize that there is something wrong with our money, who realize that great social injustice is being done, but who, not realizing that they are suffering from the injustice, dismiss the whole matter from consideration. This latter class calls to mind the prosperous individual who was being solicited for assistance by a man with whom he had been raised, with whom he had been to college, and who was his fraternity brother. After hearing a part of his companion's despairing statement, he called in two of his servants, and, bursting into tears, said to them, "Throw this old so-and-so out. He's breaking my heart."

Our unsocial national money system dates from the first issue of Government bonds in 1790, which was the forerunner of the First Bank of North America, organized in 1791, but in the last 5 years, owing to our money system, a condition has existed for which there is no historical precedent.

From earliest infancy we have all been told to believe that there is always employment of some kind for anyone who is willing to work. We have been led to believe that idleness was always voluntary and never necessary, and that those who were not employed in some sort of gainful occupation were simply lazy and worthless.

In the last 5 years we have learned that conditions can make gainful occupation impossible, that, however willing, energetic, intelligent, and well prepared an individual may be, conditions may be such that it is absolutely impossible for the individual to obtain any sort of gainful employment.

The youth of America for 150 years has had emphasized to him or her the opportunities for American youth. The Constitution of the United States has been blazoned to the world as the greatest document ever struck off at any time by the mind and for the purpose of man. Our capitalistic form of government has been held up as a model of equal opportunity and of inducement to every individual to give the very best that is in him.

In the last 5 years, the youth of America have begun to wonder: "We were born in the land of vaunted liberty and justice and equal opportunity. We have worked hard in an endeavor to prepare ourselves to be useful citizens of the Republic. Our parents have denied themselves to give us this opportunity, but we find it does not exist. We find there is nothing for us to do. We discover that unless we inherit a livelihood there is nothing we can do except possibly become hangers-on in some Government bureau."

I believe I have as close contact with young men and women as most people my age, and I say to you that if our capitalistic form of Government is to be saved, conditions must be permanently changed in the matter of economic opportunity.

I shall not this afternoon attempt an historical analysis of our monetary system. It suffices to say for the purpose of this discussion that our primary difficulty is lack of money, money being anything that facilitates the exchange of goods and services. You see daily in the great metropolitan papers that the banks are filled with money. The banks are not filled with money. There is a shortage of money everywhere. What substantially all of the banks have is the right to extend bookkeeping credits. The total capital, surplus and undivided profits of all the banks in the United States is less than $7,000,000,000. In order to have any sort of business activity there should be at least $60,000,000,000 in circulation, and the only way, under our system, that we can get $60,000,000,000 in circulation is for the banks to exercise the right they have under an unconstitutional law to create out of nothing in bookkeeping credit nine times the actual cash which they possess. How many of our people know about this? Of the 126,000,000 or 127,000,000 of the citizens of the 48 States of this Union, possibly not 2,000 understand the money system under which this country is in subjugation.

The framers of the Constitution of the United States, acquainted as they were with the curse of the private control of money which had afflicted Europe for hundreds of years, placed in the Constitution of the United States the provision that Congress had the right to coin money and regulate its value. A tremendous battle ensued between the international bankers and Alexander Hamilton on one side, and Benjamin Franklin, Jefferson, Madison, Adams, and others on the other side, the Hamilton group endeavoring to set aside the constitutional provision and the Franklin group standing for the constitutional provision. To the eternal misfortune of the United States, Franklin passed away before the issue was decided, and Jefferson and his allies were not strong enough to stand out against Hamilton and the international bankers. The immediate outcome of this battle of money was the first issue of Government bonds, resulting in the first creation, nationally, of banker's money, and in the establishment of the First Bank of North America, a private organization, just as was and is the Bank of England, the Bank of France, and the other European central banks.

If the people of this country knew that nearly 95 percent of our money is created by bank debt, and that the banks, by increasing debt to them, can expand the currency, and that by collecting debt from them, can deflate the currency, our system would not last any longer than a special session of Congress could be called to repeal the present law. International bankers control the press, they control the universities, they control the colleges, they control the high schools and the grammar schools, so that no real, vital information about the money of the country ever gets to the people, and none of the real reasons of significant historical happenings ever get into a schoolbook.

From my earliest recollection, I have wondered why practically all business was conducted on credit. It is, of course, because our money is the result of a debt. It is because the more business we do the greater the debt must be.

The other day, when reading an editorial in one of our most conservative newspapers, I ran across the statement that "Most economists agree that a nation cannot emerge from a depression until it has written off the excessive burden of debt accumulated during the preceding period of prosperity." This means that the only thing we can possibly have is never prosperity, but what seems to be prosperity, until debt, accumulating faster than production, finally creates a panic among bankers which results in their demanding payment of debts due them, which, in turn, wipes out the bank bookkeeping money of the country, and results in the dumping of all sorts of property on the market and the wiping out of values, which, in turn, after causing untold human desolation and misery, enables this group of international bankers and their allies to absorb the accumulated wealth of the country at their own price.

No one admires the magnificent efforts of the present administration more than I do. The program made toward the rehabilitation of our people has been a miracle. The magnificent courage of the head of the administration against what at first seemed hopeless odds must inspire everyone with the most profound admiration. Great progress has been made in the last 4 years toward destroying the illusion of the necessity of a gold standard, or, for that matter, of any metal standard. Great progress has been made toward an understanding of the fact that money is not wealth, but simply a means of carrying the production of the country to the consumers of the country. Great progress has been made in an understanding of the fact that those who deal in the people's medium of exchange for their own advantage are public enemies. All this I can see clearly, and with a feeling of great pride, but I say to you, my fellow citizens, with all the earnestness and sincerity of which I am capable, that this country can never have even the temporary prosperity of which it is capable, and can never have permanent prosperity, until we do away with a system controlled by private interests which can create or destroy the medium of exchange at its own will, or which medium of exchange is created by the mental attitude of the people.

In the summer of 1933 a statistician and economist, whose name is almost a household word throughout the length and breadth of the civilized world, made a speech at the Century of Progress Fair at Chicago. He stated that the country owed debt, public and private, of some $200,000,000,000, that the country had a tremendous productive capacity, and that if we all became thrifty and behaved ourselves we could pay off $25,000,000,000 of this debt in a year, and that the country would be free of debt in 8 years. He entirely lost sight of the fact that under our system, as the country's debt was paid, the money of the country would disappear, and that as the money of the country disappeared prices would fall, laborers would walk the streets unemployed, and farmers would burn their crops to better advantage than they could market them. I knew this gentleman very well, and I wrote him a letter and asked him what, under our monetary system, the people would use for money when the debts were paid. He wrote back and said he had not thought of that.

From 1930 to 1933, owing to the destruction of bank debt, the people's medium of exchange fell from 55 billion to 37 billion. Eighteen hundred million of bank deposits wiped out, not because the money was lost in the sea, not because it was buried where no one could find it, but simply because, under our system of private control of the medium of exchange and the creation of money by bank debt, the collection of debt due banks resulted in a destruction of the medium of exchange, which, in turn, destroyed the value of all property of every kind and character and caused universal destruction, universal chaos, and universal despair.

If it requires, we will say for illustration, $60,000,000,000 to transact the business of the people of the United States, this $60,000,000,000 can be created by the payment of the national debt with new money and by confining the banks to loaning the money they actually have. Such a proceeding could be taken without any so-called inflation.

If this happened, if there were actually in existence $60,000,000,000 to transact the business of the country, you could never have any inflation, you could never have any deflation, because that money would always be in existence somewhere and could not be taken out of existence by anybody. Of course, a part of it might become concentrated in certain hands, but by reinvestment it would go back into circulation and thus prevent a contraction of the currency.

I am not now attempting to discuss certain other factors which even under a constitutional money system would ultimately have to be taken into consideration. We are living in an age where machines have made unnecessary human labor to a very great extent. The greatest civilization in many respects that the world has ever known was the Grecian civilization. The philosopher Aristotle dominated the human mind for nearly 2,000 years until Francis Bacon, with his philosophy of inductive reasoning, divided with him the realm of philosophic thought. All modern logic, the fundamentals of modern mathematics, the models of modern oratory, the patterns of modern prose and poetic literature are based on the Grecian form. Greece had a great leisure class, a class which did not have to labor for its daily bread. To this class modern civilization is indebted for the glories of which I have spoken. But that class and that country decayed, and it decayed because its civilization was built upon human slavery. We have an opportunity to build a civilization, energetic, imaginative, wonderful, which in turn will not have to struggle and strive by uncongenial labor for the bread and meat to sustain its life, and we have the opportunity to create that civilization and sustain it, not on human slavery, but on machines which will serve all humanity. A consideration of ways and means to bring about this condition is not, as I said before, within the purview of this discussion.

Going back to our original theme, statesmen must realize that a money system, to function properly, must recognize the laws of physics, not misuse the laws of psychology. The total quantity of money should bear a scientific relation to the volume of consumer goods which the Nation has produced and has available for distribution. The system of money which increases or diminishes at the will of bankers or because of the excitement or despair of individuals must be destroyed.

Europe never had a greater statesman than Prince Bismarck. He realized the socially destructive influence of our National Bank Act of 1863. He is noted as having said to a fellow German, Conrad Siem, "The division of the United States into federations of equal force was decided long before the Civil War by the high financial powers of Europe. These bankers were afraid that the United States, if they remained in one block and as one nation, would attain economic and financial independence, which would upset their financial domination over the world. The voice of the Rothschilds predominated. They foresaw tremendous booty if they could substitute two feeble democracies, indebted to the financiers, for the vigorous Republic, which was practically self-providing. Therefore, they started their emmissaries in order to exploit the question of slavery and thus to dig an abyss between the two parts of the Republic. Lincoln never suspected these underground machinations. He was against slavery, and he was elected as such. His character prevented him from being the man of one party. When he had affairs in his hands he perceived that these sinister financiers of Europe wished to make him the executor of their designs. They made the rupture between the North and the South imminent. The masters of finance in Europe made the rupture to exploit. Lincoln's personality surprised them. His being a candidate had not troubled them; they thought to easily dupe the wood cutter. But Lincoln read their plots and understood that the South was not the worst foe, but the financiers."

In 1872 Horace Greeley wrote his opinion of the National Bank Act. "We have stricken the shackles from 4,000,000 human beings and brought all laborers to a common level, not so much by the elevation of the former slaves as by practically reducing the whole working population, white and black, to a condition of serfdom. While boasting of our noble deeds we are careful to conceal the ugly fact that by our iniquitous money system we have nationalized a system of oppression which, though more refined, is not less cruel than the old system of chattel slavery."

At the time when Lincoln was struggling to set up a money system as provided by the Constitution of the United States, fear was expressed that the United States would establish an honest money system and be forever free from the clutches of the international bankers. The London Times, that backbone of reactionary England, said, "If that mischievous financial policy, which had its origin in the North American Republic during the late war in that country, should become indurated down to a fixture, then that Government will furnish its own money without cost. It will pay off its debts and be without a debt. It will have all the money necessary to carry on its commerce. It will become prosperous beyond all precedent in the history of the civilized governments of the world. The brains and the wealth of all countries will go to North America. That Government must be destroyed or it will destroy every monarchy on the globe."

The Federal Reserve Act, of course, admits a greater expansion of the currency, but the principle of private control of the people's medium of exchange and of the creation of the medium of exchange by debt, and the destruction of the medium of exchange by the demand for payment of the debt, remain the same.

Up to this time the discussion has proceeded along the lines of criticism of the monetary system of the United States. No remedy has been suggested. In other words, no constructive suggestion has been made. May I be permitted to say that beginning with 1922, I have, at every session of Congress, introduced bills which appeared to me to constitute suggestions for monetary reform. Extensive hearings were held on bills introduced by me in 1922 and 1924. As you will remember, the Republican Party was in power and, after interesting a prominent Republican in the subject, hearings were held on his bills in 1926, 1927, and 1928. A bill introduced by me to stabilize the currency passed the House of Representatives in 1932 by a majority of 289 to 60, but did not pass the Senate. Extensive hearings were held in 1934 on a bill introduced by me for the creation of a national monetary authority. In 1935 the Goldsborough amendment to the Banking Act of 1935 was defeated by a small majority. This statement is made only for the purpose of indicating that insofar as I am concerned, I have not engaged in destructive criticism, but have endeavored to support constructive reform; and have never, under any circumstances, engaged in personal attack. There is as great a percentage of high-minded and patriotic bankers as there are of any other class. My endeavor has been to create a better money system for all of the people of the United States.

I know that this afternoon I could, within a short time, write on a piece of paper the names of 50 men who, if they had the power, could place upon the statute books of the United States a law which would make poverty as rare as a prehistoric animal. Through all recorded history the strength and the wisdom of the people has come from the soil. There are this afternoon in this room representatives from all of the great 48 States of the Union; representatives of that great part of our population that furnishes in so large a part the sinews and brains of the country.

It lies within your power, with the knowledge you have and the influence you can exert upon those who represent you in the American Congress, to see to it that legislation is passed and passed quickly, which will make it possible to distribute the tremendous potential production of farm and factory to all our people, to create a prosperity unending, and such as the world has never seen; a condition which will make those who have labored long in the vineyard exclaim with ancient Simeon: "Lord, now lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen Thy salvation!"

Several years ago our people in several parts of the country thought it would be better in the summer to start work an hour earlier and shut down an hour earlier in order to have a longer recreational period at the end of the day. There were a great many learned and tiresome discussions as to how this could be done, but nobody had the influence and power to simply tell people to get up an hour earlier and have them do it and stop work an hour earlier and have them do that.

One morning some bright lad woke up with the idea of simply setting the clock up an hour during certain months of the year, and the whole problem was immediately solved.

If certain individuals would say to our 127 millions of citizens, "You must, from time to time, turn over your property to us. You shall labor and your children shall labor. You and they shall suffer every privation in order to accumulate more property of some kind of character. But, after a certain time, after you have built up your fortunes substantially, you must turn them over to us", they would be unable to enforce their demands; they would be laughed at; they would be considered demented.

Matters are not managed that way. After a period of depression, the banks gradually begin to lend, book credits created by bank loans become bank deposits; bank deposits passing by check increase the circulating medium of the country. Business expands on borrowed money. Increased circulation raises prices. In other words, we are in a so-called period of prosperity. The more credit is given by the banks the greater the volume of our circulating medium becomes; prices mount; the higher prices justify more bank credits, and the boom is on.

One day the master minds meet and decide that the time has come to gather in the accumulated property of the people. Rumors are started that conditions are unsound. Frightened city and community bankers begin to curtail their loans. Rediscount rates are raised in Federal Reserve banks, thus requiring further curtailment. Repayment of loans to the banks causes a fall of deposits, the credit currency is contracted, falling prices close factories and put workmen on the streets, and the price of basic products—corn, wheat, cotton, cattle, hogs—takes an immediate drop. We become a nation of debtors unable to pay our debts, and the accumulations of years of self-denial are swept away.

Formerly when we were operating on the gold standard as originally administered, it was a financier's racket to transport gold back and forth between the United States and England. Taking gold out of the United States caused prices to fall, and bringing it back caused prices to rise, so that the international bankers and their allies could take gold out of the country and absorb the Nation's wealth at low prices and bring the gold back and sell at high prices. By this method other people's property was absorbed by the international money changers by a device as simple as the daylight saving one which makes people go to work and quit work an hour earlier.

I am not here and now making an argument for silver, or for any sort of reserve, but I wonder how many of us here today know how the international bankers and their allies succeeded in contracting the currency in 1873 by demonetizing silver.

A perfectly harmless bill was introduced entitled "An act revising and amending the law as relative to the mints, assay offices, and coinage of the United States." This bill was signed by President Grant, and 8 months later, in a letter dated October 3, 1873, he admitted he did not understand that the bill he had signed had demonetized silver. Most of the Senators and Representatives whose votes legalized the demonetizing act were innocent of any intention of destroying silver as any part of the monetary base. Just how the bill was doctored is not a pretty story, and the telling of it would add nothing to the force of the argument I am attempting to make in this discussion.

The Honorable W. D. Kelly, Chairman of the Committee on Coinage, which had the bill in charge, made the following statement on the floor of the House of Representatives on March 9, 1878: "In connection with the charge that I advocated the bill which demonetized the standard silver dollar, I say that though Chairman of the Committee on Coinage, I was as ignorant of the fact that it would demonetize the silver dollar, or of its dropping the silver from our system of coins, as were those distinguished Senators, Messrs. Blaine and Voorhies, who were then Members of the House, and each of whom a few days since interrogated the other: 'Did you know it was dropped when the bill was passed?' 'No', said Mr. Blaine; 'did you?' 'No', said Mr. Voorhies. I do not think that there were three Members of the House that knew it. I doubt whether Mr. Hooper, who in my absence from the Committee on Coinage, and attendance on the Committee of Ways and Means, managed the bill, knew it. I say this in justice to him."

On July 13, 1876, Congressman Holman made the following statement on the floor of the House of Representatives: "I have before me the record of the proceedings of the House on the passage of that measure, a record which no man can read without being convinced that the measure and the method of its passage through this House were a colossal swindle. I assert that the measure never had the sanction of this House and did not possess the moral force of law."

Again on August 5, 1876, Mr. Holman said: "The original bill was simply a bill to organize a bureau of mines and coinage. The bill which finally passed the House and ultimately became a law was certainly not read in this House. It was never considered before this House as it was passed. Up to the time the bill came before this House for final passage the measure had simply been one to establish a bureau of mines. It came from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. The substitute which finally became a law was never read, and is subject to the charge made against it by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Bland] that it was passed by the House without a knowledge of its provisions, especially upon that of coinage. I myself asked the question of Mr. Hooper whether it changed the law in regard to coinage, and the answer of Mr. Hooper left the impression on the whole House that the subject of the coinage was not affected by the bill."

General Garfield, afterward the martyred President of the United States, in a speech made at Springfield, Ohio, in the fall of 1877, said: "Perhaps I ought to be ashamed to say so, but it is the truth to say that, at the time being chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and having my hands overfull during all that time with work, I never read the bill. I took it upon the faith of a prominent Democrat and a prominent Republican, and I do not know that I voted at all. There was no demand for the yeas and nays, and no one opposed the bill that I know of. It was put through as dozens of bills are, as my friends and I know, in Congress and on the faith of the report of the chairman of committee."

As you will remember, the result of the demonetization of silver was such a curtailment in the volume of money of the Nation that a terrible depression, lasting several years, was suffered. Senator Ferry, of Michigan, made the following statement regarding the panic of 1873, caused by the demonetization of silver: "Millions of people were reduced from good circumstances to penury, or covered with debt, beneath which burden their backs must bend until it is unloaded at the grave, where an innocent posterity must take it up and bear it on."

I do not claim, of course, that any human means can be devised which will immediately cure human inefficiency, human hardness of heart, human mental or physical incapacity, human shiftlessness, or lack of character.

I do say, however, that all the human deficiencies I have enumerated are handmaids of human poverty, and that the elimination of human poverty would gradually eliminate human frailty.

I do say that the only reason we have poverty in this country is that of inadequate means of distribution. I do say that the inadequate means of distribution are due primarily to defects in our money system, and that if these defects were eliminated and we had another system, the sole purpose of which was to facilitate the exchange of goods and services, that our people would soon go another step in the science of distribution, with the outcome the validity of the concept that we are all the heirs of all the ages, and that some part of the production of the inventions which have sprung from the genius of all the people are the heritage and the rightful property of all the people.

Of one thing there can never be danger. There can never be any danger of oversatisfying human want. This truth has been magnificently expressed by William James in his essay on Reflex Action and Theism in the Will to Believe. "Man's chief difference from the brutes lies in the exuberant excess of his subjective propensities, his preeminence over them simply and solely in the number and in the fantastic and unnecessary character of his wants, physical, moral, esthetic, and intellectual. Had his whole life not been a quest for the superfluous, he would never have established himself as inexpugnably as he has done in the necessary. And from the consciousness of this he should draw the lesson that his wants are to be trusted; that even when their gratification seems farthest off, the uneasiness they occasion is still the best guide of his life, and will lead him to issues entirely beyond his present powers of reckoning. Prune down his extravagance, sober him, and you undo him."

I do not know how I can better close this attempt, to some extent, to emphasize the great work before the people of this country than to quote from the great wartime President, Woodrow Wilson: "The great monopoly in this country is the monopoly of big credits. So long as it exists our old variety and freedom and individual energy of development are out of the question. A great industrial nation is controlled by its system of credit. Our system of credit is concentrated. The growth of the Nation, therefore, and all our activities, are in the hands of a few men who chill and check and destroy genuine economic freedom."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Townsend plan.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

THE AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, the Supreme Court of the United States has just handed down its opinion declaring the Agricultural Adjustment Act to be unconstitutional. [Applause.] I should like for it to be noted that the applause comes entirely from the Republican side of the House. [Applause.]

This decision of the Court will be received with consternation and amazement by millions of farmers throughout this land who have been benefited by the first constructive program that any Congress or any administration has ever proposed in their behalf. [Applause.] It comes to them as a sickening and deadly blow.

Regardless of Court opinions, Mr. Speaker, I believe there are enough Members of the present Congress who are so deeply interested in the welfare of the American farmer that they will keep this Congress in session until Christmas, if necessary, to write upon the statute books legislation that will repair this damage. The farmers of the Nation will never return to the economic slavery that existed prior to 1933. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I shall not object——

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I will not object in this instance—but under the formula laid down, and very properly so, by the Speaker a few moments ago, I think when a day is set aside for the consideration of a particular calendar the day should be devoted to that purpose; and although it is very difficult and unpleasant to interpose objections to requests of our friends on the other side, we must carry through the program; and I shall object to any further requests for unanimous consent today. I shall not object to this request.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. RICH. When are we going to get an opportunity to reply to the message that we heard on Friday night?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I may say to the gentleman it is the expectation to take up the independent offices appropriation bill on Wednesday, and probably the remainder of the week will be given to its consideration. Ample opportunity will be afforded for general debate.

Mr. RICH. Will we be given an opportunity then to comment on the state of the Union?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly; the gentleman will be given such opportunity.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I intended in the 5 minutes merely to read excerpts from the Boston Post by W. K. Kellogg, of Kellogg's Corn Flakes, showing what the 30-hour week has done in his business during the past 5 years. Mr. Kellogg has increased the wages of his workers 12½ percent; and he believes, in company with Mr. Robert Johnson, of Johnson & Johnson, of Brunswick, N. J., that the remedy for the situation where 11,000,000 people are unemployed today in the United States is to go on a 5-day week and 6-hour day. This is all I wanted to read from Mr. Kellogg's statement.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to put this article in the RECORD so that the membership may read it. These are not my views, but the views of Mr. Kellogg, an important business man in the United States. The article is not long and I think it will be of great interest.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how much of the RECORD will the article take?

Mr. CONNERY. Just a little space.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, the article to which I have referred in my remarks is as follows:

[Boston Post, Thursday, Jan. 2, 1936]

HIGHER PAY IN SPITE OF 6-HOUR DAY—W. K. KELLOGG, CEREAL MANUFACTURER, HAS FINE RESULTS

BATTLE CREEK, MICH., January 1.—Continued improvement in business conditions during 1936 was foreseen today by W. K. Kellogg, the cereal manufacturer, in announcing a material increase in the company's advertising appropriations for the year.

SOLUTION OF UNEMPLOYMENT

But while business will continue to improve, he said, unemployment is still one of the outstanding problems which must be solved before there can be complete recovery. The solution, in Mr. Kellogg's opinion, is widespread adoption of the 6-hour day with wages increased to preserve the purchasing power of the individual worker. The Kellogg Co. has had the 6-hour day for 5 years, and recently increased daily wages to the highest point in the company's history.

"We were able to do this as a result of the economies and efficiencies brought about by the 6-hour day on the one hand, and by the increased sales that resulted from our continuous program of sales promotion and advertising on the other," Mr. Kellogg said.

NEWSPAPER ADVERTISING BEST

In announcing the increased promotion, Mr. Kellogg said the company will continue to employ many advertising media, but that newspaper advertising "will remain the most important part of the program."

"The cooperation and the flexibility of this type of advertising", he said, "have enabled us to concentrate our efforts where they are most needed with a minimum of delay and have proved to us over and over again the outstanding value of newspaper advertising."

Discussing the 6-hour day as a solution of the unemployment problem, Mr. Kellogg said its adoption in the Kellogg plant in 1930 resulted in an immediate increase of 20 percent in employment and that in 1935 the average number of employees was 39 percent greater than it had been under the 8-hour day.

SHORTER DAY, HIGHER WAGES

"After 2½ years", he said, "the 6-hour day proved so satisfactory that we adopted it as a permanent policy. Then in October 1935 we announced an increase in wages that brings our total wage scale to the highest point in the history of the company, higher for 6 hours than it had been for 8 hours before the depression, with a minimum daily wage for men of $4.50. This we were able to do as a result of the economies and efficiency brought about by the 6-hour day on the one hand, and by the increased sales that resulted from our continuous program of sales promotion and advertising on the other.

GREAT PROBLEM CAN BE SOLVED

"I believe the 6-hour day, voluntarily adopted by those industries in which it would be practicable, would be the most effective step that could be taken to relieve unemployment. But merely to cut down the hours of labor without, at the same time, offering a living wage will spell more trouble. The employer's problem is to maintain purchasing power, without which he will come to grief ultimately, by paying as much or more for the short day as for the long one.

"That is a problem, indeed, but we have proved to our own satisfaction that it is not impossible of solution, and I believe that others will reach the same conclusion. It seems to me only simple justice that the employee should be allowed to share in the benefits of invention and improved processes, not penalized for them. There are always corners to be cut, leaks which can be stopped. The employer must display unwonted ingenuity in this direction, but if he does so, I do not believe he will suffer materially for permitting his employees a fairer return for their labor."

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 3, 1936.

The SPEAKER HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: The contest for a seat in the House of Representatives from the Twentieth District of New York was instituted by James J. Lanzetta against the returned Member, Vito Marcantonio, pursuant to the provisions of the act of March 2, 1887, as evidenced by the filing in the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives of a notice of contest and of the reply thereto by the contestee.

The Clerk received within the time prescribed by law testimony adduced on behalf of contestee, but no testimony has been received on behalf of the contestant, and the time for taking the same under the law has long since expired. Papers and testimony in the possession of this office will be transmitted to that Committee on Elections to which the case shall be referred.

Very respectfully,

SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

The communication was referred to the Committee on Elections No. 1 and ordered printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 3, 1936.

The SPEAKER HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to lay before the House of Representatives the contest for a seat as a Delegate in the House of Representatives for the Seventy-fourth Congress of the United States for the Territory of Hawaii, Lincoln Loy McCandless against Samuel Wilder King, notice of which has been filed in the office of the Clerk of the House; and also transmit herewith original testimony, papers, and documents relating thereto.

In compliance with the act approved March 2, 1887, entitled "An act relating to contested-election cases", and such portions of the testimony as the parties in interest agreed upon or as seemed proper to the Clerk, after giving the requisite notices, have been printed, and indexed together with the notices of contest, and the answers thereto and original papers and exhibits have been sealed up and are ready to be laid before the Committee on Elections.

Two copies of the printed testimony in the aforesaid case have been mailed to the contestant and the same number to the contestee which, together with copies of the briefs of the parties, will be laid before the Committee on Elections to which the case shall be referred.

Yours respectfully,

SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Referred to Committee on Elections No. 2 and ordered printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 3, 1936.

The SPEAKER HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to lay before the House of Representatives a notice of the contest for a seat in the House of Representatives for the Seventy-fourth Congress of the United States for the Nineteenth Congressional District of the State of Ohio, Locke Miller v. John G. Cooper, notice of which has been filed in the office of the Clerk of the House; and also transmit herewith original testimony, papers, and documents relating thereto.

In compliance with the act approved March 2, 1887, entitled "An act relating to contested-election cases", and such portions of the testimony as the parties in interest agreed upon or as seemed proper to the Clerk, and indexed together with the notices of contest, and the answers thereto and original papers and exhibits have been sealed up and are ready to be laid before the Committee on Elections.

Two copies of the printed testimony in the aforesaid case have been mailed to the contestant and the same number to the contestee. When the briefs of the parties shall have been received they will be laid before the Committee on Elections to which the case shall be referred.

Yours respectfully,

SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Referred to the Committee on Elections No. 3 and ordered printed.

ADDRESS BEFORE THE PHILIPPINE LEGISLATURE

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech that was made by the honored Speaker of this House at the last joint meeting of the Philippine Legislature. I want to say to the Members that it was a fine speech, admirably delivered, and I think it is proper that it should be placed in the RECORD at this time. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS, Speaker of the House of Representatives, before the last joint session of the Philippine Legislature at Manila on November 12, 1935:

Mr. President, Mr. Speaker, and members of the Philippine Assembly, it is indeed a high honor to appear before you on this occasion in anticipation of the historic processes soon to be inaugurated as a preliminary to the birth of a new and independent nation. As a member of the party of United States Senators and Congressmen who, with their wives and important members of the United States press, have come on your generous invitation from our homeland to extend our congratulations and cordial good will on this memorable occasion, I wish to join in the felicitations and good wishes so eloquently expressed by our able, distinguished, and much-beloved Vice President, the second ranking officer of our Government, and who speaks as the leader of our delegation. I join in his expression of pride that this historic event has been made possible by the generous action of our great Republic in voluntarily surrendering its right of sovereignty and the interests which go with it in order that the people of the Philippine Islands may enjoy that sense of national freedom and independence which we have enjoyed for nearly 150 years. So far as I know, it is the first time that a great people have achieved independence without the necessity of securing it at the point of the sword; and may I say, Mr. President, and to you, Mr. Speaker, that while my country has surrendered its sovereignty it never has and never will surrender its friendship and sympathetic interest in the Filipino people. No real republican form of government has ever existed as such for any great length of time which did not recognize the principles of democracy and the common good of the people as a whole. It is the practice of those fundamental ideals which has made our own country great and powerful and its people happy and contented during the past years.

May I say that it is for you gentlemen and other leaders in your nation to preserve and make lasting these principles so well expressed in the highly progressive constitution which you have approved. We feel certain that this will be done by the incoming administration headed as it will be by your very able and devoted leader and President, Hon. Manuel Quezon. We look with confidence, therefore, to your development and "strike hands with you across the sea" in best wishes for your future endeavors along these lines.

In the House of Representatives we find that the following Congressmen and Senators in our party served in the same period that your President Manuel Quezon represented your country as the Philippine Commissioner in the House of Representatives: John N. Garner, Joseph T. Robinson, Matthew M. Neely, James F. Byrnes, Robert L. Doughton, Bertrand H. Snell, and Allen T. Treadway, all of whom have risen to places of influence and distinction in the Congress.

We found him to be a very able man, resourceful, considerate, and dependable. His contacts with these Members of Congress, a few of whom I have mentioned, I know have given him not only a theoretical but a very practical knowledge of the workings of the American system of government.

We have all come in contact with the many able Commissioners you have sent to Washington during past years, and whose names I shall not have time to mention, and also with the able men who have come to Washington from time to time as members of various high commissions. All of this has served to increase our confidence in your future, for all were able and faithful representatives of your interests. Undoubtedly honest differences of political opinion will arise, but these will be solved, I am sure, in a spirit of amity and good will.

In considering your new constitution I find first and foremost those declarations in the bill of rights to which the Vice President has referred.

Through his pleasant contact with the Congress, your new President-elect has acquired a practical viewpoint of other administration details for the interpretation in a fair and equitable way of the provisions of your constitution.

I bespeak for him your united support, and that you will give him generously of your advice and assistance, that the way may be smoothed for the attainment of the high ideals he possesses.

He has had associated with him for the last few years as Governor General of the Philippine Islands Governor Frank Murphy, an able and conscientious executive whose experiences as mayor of one of our great cities, Detroit, has familiarized him with finance and orderly government. In his official contacts here we are pleased but not surprised to know that he has displayed tact and good judgment.

For the next 10 years at least the American flag will fly over your Commonwealth and you will have with you an official representing the United States, who will have the title of High Commissioner. This official, I am happy to believe, will be your present able Governor General and he will be representative of the President of the United States when it is necessary for him to act.

His sympathetic cooperation during our continued sovereignty, subject to changes by Congress, will be the expression of the American people.

For 10 years, unless there is a change, the Stars and Stripes, for which I know you have the greatest respect, will fly over the Commonwealth. The Philippine flag, red, white, and blue, with its three stars and its blazing sun, typifying the tropics, will be carried on all standards. These sister flags will do much as they have in the past to strengthen the fine type of friendship which exists today.

When the time comes for the Republic to replace the Commonwealth, we believe that the conduct of its affairs during this period will so impress the nations of the world that the new Republic will begin its career with not only the old friendship of my country, but that all the enlightened nations of the earth will unite in its protection and in the preservation of its sovereignty.

The great American Nation will watch your development with keen interest and, wherever we may, will extend a helping hand.

You raise products which are not raised in the United States. We sell your manufactured articles which are not made in your country. We believe that the President's Commission will work out an equitable plan beneficial to both our nations, and that the result of its recommendations will strengthen the ties that will become stronger with the years.

The administration of President Quezon and Vice President Osmeña is entitled to unified support. Your example of unity, patriotism, and self-sacrifice will have a most beneficial and heartening effect on the people of my country and make it more simple and easy to reconcile any inequalities that now exist or may occur.

A strong government administering your affairs under your progressive constitution, which has been approved by our great President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, will make for harmony, unity, and cooperation.

It was kind of the Philippine people to include in their invitation to Senators and Congressmen an invitation for their wives. They have enjoyed the visit. You have aroused their sympathy and interest as you have our own.

I have learned that the Filipino women are leaders in the matter of education. They are the household bankers. They have followed the teachings of our school teachers and our economists. They have many of the favorite American dishes in their kitchens. So on behalf of the ladies of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, I thank you for the courtesy of the invitation, but I have the suspicion that back of it was the thought that our wives and daughters who have come with us will in the future help to tighten the bonds of friendship and good will between our nations.

I cannot close these remarks without referring briefly to my friend and your friend Hon. Harry B. Hawes. As United States Senator, and since then, he has been an earnest, devoted, and able friend of the Philippine people. He merits your friendship and gratitude for his faithful and unselfish work in your behalf.

Let me again thank you for the high privilege that has been extended to us and to our wives to visit you and study first hand your conditions and your aspirations. Let me assure you that we are taking home with us the kindliest thoughts of a pleasant and instructive visit.

To have even a small part in the establishment of an independent republic in the great Orient, to know that the fine traditions of America will be preserved, is satisfaction enough for all right-thinking Americans.

THE SUPREME COURT'S TENDENCY TO LEGISLATE BY MEMBERS OF THE COURT—DISSENTING OPINIONS OF MEMBERS OF THE SUPREME COURT

Mr. RAMSAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of dissenting opinions of members of the Supreme Court.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSAY. Mr. Speaker, being a lawyer who has practiced law continuously for the past 35 years, I have been obsessed with the idea that judges and those who are learned in the law are probably better qualified than any other citizen to determine whether or not an act of Congress is derogatory to the Constitution. But if you are a lawyer, who has studied the legislation adopted by our Congress during the life of our Republic, you will be compelled to confess that your researches of such legislation have disclosed to you that no act was ever passed by Congress with the open or avowed purpose of flaunting or circumventing the Constitution. But on the contrary every such act was debated fully, and the majority who enacted such legislation honestly believed that under the terms of the Constitution the Congress was well within its rights and undoubtedly was attempting to carry out the wishes of the people.

And if you have studied the decisions of our Supreme Court on this subject you will be convinced that the Court, in setting aside such acts, did not remove from your mind reasonable doubt about the constitutionality of the acts. But, on the contrary, the Court was so divided in opinion that their decisions only added confusion to the doubt they sought to remove.

Our Supreme Court has many times seriously divided its councils upon passing on acts of Congress, and many great members of the Court have charged it with undertaking to usurp the power of legislation and were therefore themselves violating the Constitution and trespassing upon the power of Congress to enact legislation as granted to it by the people under the Constitution itself.

That we may understand the views of some of the greatest of our Supreme Court judges, I beg to cite and quote from the income-tax case known as Pollock v. Farmers Loan & Trust Co. (157 U. S. 429 and 158 U. S. 601), decided in 1895, Justices Harlan, Brown, Jackson, and White dissented. In dissenting, Justice Harlan argued:

That by reversing the earlier law and practice of the Government the majority of the Court rendered it necessary to amend the Constitution to secure principles of right, justice, and equality in Federal taxation—

And he insisted that policy and economic considerations rather than law actuated the majority in their conclusion.

Again, in 1902, in the case of Connolly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co. (184 U. S. 540), decided in 1902, Justice McKenna dissenting from the opinion of the Court said:

Courts are not to determine, he thought, whether laws are arbitrary, oppressive, or capricious, indeed whether such combinations are evils or blessings, or to what extent either, is not a judicial inquiry. * * * To consider their effect would take us from legal problems to economic ones, and this demonstrates to my mind how essentially any judgment or action based upon these differences is legislative and cannot be reviewed by the judiciary.

Again, in Burton v. United States (202 U. S. 344), decided in 1906, Justices Brewer, White, and Peckham dissented from the opinion of the Court and declared—

That the construction now given writes into the statute an offense which Congress never placed there. It is a criminal case, and in such a case, above all, judicial legislation is to be deprecated.

In the case of Weems v. United States (217 U. S. 349), decided in 1910, Justice White, with the concurrence of Justice Holmes, recorded a vigorous dissent:

They thought if legislation defining and punishing crime is held repugnant to constitutional limitations because it "seems to the judicial mind not to have been sufficiently impelled by motives of reformation of the criminal"—

The legislative power is impotent to control crime. Since the decisions subjected to judicial control the degree of severity with which authorized modes of punishment might be inflicted, it seemed to the minority—

That the demonstration is conclusive that nothing will be left of the independent legislative power to punish and define crime.

The direct result of the decisions, it was maintained, was to expand the judicial power by endowing it with a vast authority to control the legislative department in the exercise of its rightful discretion.

In the case of Lochner v. New York (198 U. S. 45), decided in 1905, Justices Harlan, White, Day, and Holmes dissented. Justice Harlan, writing the dissenting opinion, declared:

It is not the province of the Court to inquire, under our system of government, whether or not this be wise legislation. The courts are not concerned with the wisdom or policy of legislation. We do not regard it as within the function of the Court to determine what is sound economic theory in the realm of labor legislation.

Justice Holmes prepared a separate dissenting opinion, in which he declared:

This case is decided upon an economic theory, which a large part of the country does not entertain. If it were a question whether I agreed with that theory, I should desire to study it further and long before making up my mind. But I do not conceive that to be my duty, because I strongly believe that my agreement or disagreement has nothing to do with the right of a majority to embody their opinions in law.

Again, in the case of Employers' Liability Cases (207 U. S. 463), decided in 1908, Justices Moody, Harlan, McKenna, and Holmes dissented from the judgment of the Court. Justice Moody, in the course of his dissenting opinion, said:

The Court has never exercised the mighty power of declaring the acts of a coordinate branch of the Government void, except where there is no possible and sensible construction of the act which is consistent with the fundamental organic law. The presumption that other branches of the Government will restrain themselves within the scope of their authority and the respect which is due to them and their acts admit of no other attitude from this Court. * * * But the economic opinion of the judges and their views of the requirements of justice and public policy, even when crystallized into well-settled doctrines of law, have no constitutional sanctity. They are binding upon succeeding judges, but while they may influence, they cannot control legislators. Legislators have their own economic theories, their views of justice and public policy, and their views when embodied in written law must prevail.

In the case of the Standard Oil Co. v. United States (221 U. S. 1), decided in 1911, dissenting in part from the reasoning of the majority, Justice Harlan claimed—

That the Court, by its decisions, when interpreted by the language of its opinion, has not only upset the long unsettled interpretation of the Sherman Antitrust Act but has usurped the constitutional functions of the legislative branch of the Government.

Continuing further, he said:

I am impelled to say that there is abroad, in our land, a most harmful tendency to bring about the amending of constitutions and legislative enactments by means alone of judicial construction.

In the case of Burns Baking Co. v. Bryan (264 U. S. 504), decided in 1923, Justice Brandeis, dissenting, said—

That the Court had decided, as a fact, that the prohibition of excess weights is not necessary for the protection of the purchasers against imposition and fraud by short weights; that the law subjected bakers and sellers of bread to heavy burdens.

Continuing, he said:

In my opinion, this is an exercise of the powers of a super-legislature—not the performance of the constitutional function of judicial review.

In the case of Hammer v. Dagenhart (247 U. S. 251), decided in 1918, Justices Holmes, McKenna, Brandeis, and Clark dissented and said:

We should have thought that the most conspicuous decision of this Court has made it clear that the power to regulate commerce and other constitutional powers could not be cut down or qualified by the fact that it might interfere with the carrying out of the domestic policy of any State. The act does not meddle with anything belonging to the States. They may regulate their internal affairs and their domestic commerce as they like, but when they seek to send their products across the State line they are no longer within their rights.

In the case of Adkins v. Children's Hospital (261 U. S. 525), decided in 1923, Chief Justice Taft and Justices Sanford and Holmes dissented. In dissenting, Justice Taft said:

It is not the function of this Court to hold congressional acts invalid simply because they are passed to carry out economic views which the Court believes to be unwise or unsound.

Justice Holmes, in dissenting, said:

I confess that I do not understand the principle on which the power to fix a minimum for the wages of women can be denied by those who admit the power to fix a maximum for their hours of work. (Hours of work for women in the District of Columbia had previously been upheld by the Court.)

The very latest criticism of the Court by its own members relative to its tendency to pass upon questions of policy rather than law, is the case of the United States of America against Gus L. Constantine, which was decided at the October term of Court in 1935, and is not yet in print.

In this case Justices Cardozo, Brandeis, and Stone dissented, and in dissenting in this case, Justice Cardozo expressed the following:

If I interpret the reasoning aright, it does not rest upon the ruling that Congress would have gone beyond its power, if the purpose that it professed was the purpose truly cherished. The judgment of the Court rests upon the ruling that another purpose, not professed, may be read beneath the surface, and by the purpose so imputed, the statute is destroyed. Thus, the process of psychoanalysis has spread to unaccustomed fields. There is a wise and ancient doctrine that a court will not inquire into the motives of a legislative body or assume them to be wrongful (Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cr. 87; Magnana Co. v. Hamilton, 292 U. S. 40). There is another wise and ancient doctrine that a court will not adjudge the invalidity of a statute except for manifest necessity. Every reasonable doubt must have been explored and extinguished before moving to that grave conclusion (Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. 213). The warning sounded by this Court in the Sinking Fund Cases (99 U. S. 700), has lost none of its significance. Every presumption is in favor of the validity of a statute, and this continues until the contrary is shown beyond a rational doubt. One branch of the Government cannot encroach on the domain of another without danger. The safety of our institutions depends in no small degree on a strict observance of this salutary rule. I cannot rid myself of the conviction that in the imputation to the lawmakers of a purpose not professed, this salutary rule of caution is now forgotten or neglected after all the many protestations of its cogency and virtue.

It is my belief that no act of Congress should be set aside by our courts unless the court can by unanimous decisions declare that the enactment is a violation of the Constitution. This would remove doubt and add great weight to the decisions of our courts and allay the suspicion of our people that the court has set itself up as a super legislative body.

In closing I desire to quote from the decision of Chief Justice Marshall in the original case of our Supreme Court, where it decided for the first time the power of Congress to enact legislation under the commerce clause of our Constitution (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1), where he said:

The wisdom and the discretion of Congress, their identity with the people, and the influence which their constituents possess at elections are in this as in many other instances as that, for example, of declaring war, the sole restraints on which they have relied to secure them from its abuse. They are the restraints on which the people must often rely solely in all representative governments.

THE CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. Under the order of the House this is unanimous-consent day, and the Clerk will call the first bill on the Consent Calendar.

AMENDING THE ACT OF FEBRUARY 28, 1925, IN RELATION TO THE NAVAL RESERVE AND THE MARINE CORPS RESERVE

The Clerk called the first bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 5731, to amend in certain particulars the act approved February 28, 1925, entitled "An act to provide for the creation, organization, administration, and maintenance of a Naval Reserve and a Marine Corps Reserve", as amended, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Navy Department has submitted additional amendments to the Naval Reserve bill, I ask that this bill be resubmitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

PUBLIC-DOMAIN LANDS IN NEVADA AND OREGON

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 4126) to reserve certain public-domain lands in Nevada and Oregon as a grazing reserve for Indians of Fort McDermitt, Nev.

The SPEAKER. This bill requires three objections. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. There is a similar Senate bill (S. 1142) on the Speaker's table. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma desire to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill?

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. I do.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Senate bill, S. 1142, will be substituted for the House bill.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That public-domain lands in the States of Nevada and Oregon described as lots 3, 4, and west half of lot 5 of section 1; lots 1 to 9, inclusive; west half lot 10 and north half southwest quarter section 2; lots 1 to 10, inclusive, and south half section 3; lots 1 to 10, inclusive, and southeast quarter section 4; lots 1 to 4, inclusive, and lots 8, 10, 11, and 12 of section 5; north half northeast quarter section 9; north half northwest quarter and northwest quarter northeast quarter section 10, township 47 north, range 39 east, of the Mount Diablo meridian, Nevada; and southeast quarter section 20; west half southeast quarter and southeast quarter southeast quarter section 21; south half section 22; northwest quarter, southeast quarter and south half southwest quarter section 26; west half southeast quarter, west half northeast quarter, and northeast quarter northeast quarter section 27; all of section 28; east half and southwest quarter section 29; all of sections 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, and southwest quarter section 36, of township 40 south, range 44 east; and all of sections 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, west half northeast quarter, north half southeast quarter, and southwest quarter southeast quarter section 12; west half section 13; all of sections 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, and fractional sections 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, and west half of fractional section 24 of township 41 south, range 44 east, of the Willamette meridian, in Oregon, containing approximately 21,500 acres, be, and the same are hereby, withdrawn from the public domain and reserved for the use and occupancy of Indians of the former Fort McDermitt Military Reserve, Nev.: Provided, That the rights and claims of bona-fide settlers initiated under the public-land laws prior to July 7, 1933, shall not be affected by this act.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

A House bill (H. R. 4126) was laid on the table.

CHANNEL BETWEEN CLEAR LAKE AND LOST RIVER, CALIF.

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 6773) to deepen the irrigation channel between Clear Lake and Lost River, in the State of California, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PAYMENT TO UINTAH AND OTHER BANDS OF INDIANS FOR CERTAIN COAL LANDS

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 6019) authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Uintah, White River, and Uncompahgre Bands of Ute Indians in the State of Utah for certain coal lands and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I note that the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs is present. I desire to explain my position on Indian bills. First, let me say the trouble with Indian bills that are brought here is that we have no report whatsoever from the General Accounting Office, where all the records are located. With all due respect to the Secretary of the Interior and to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, I say they do not know from their records what this country has done for the Indians, nor what claims have been paid, nor advances made.

A bill was recently introduced and reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs providing for the payment to a certain band of Indians for certain lands which they did not receive under a treaty. I took the matter up with the Comptroller General of the United States, in charge of the General Accounting Office, and found that the Government of the United States had paid for that land to that band of Indians before I was born. When I called his attention to that fact, the author of the bill thanked me, and the bill was withdrawn.

I am not going to let Indian bills pass until I can get a report from the General Accounting Office, to see whether or not the money has been paid, or, furthermore, to see what advances and gratuities the Government has made to the Indians of the tribe that is seeking to be reimbursed.

There is a bill pending from my own State for reimbursement, not an Indian bill, and if I can stop it, I shall do so. I do not think there is any State in the Union or any municipality, or county, or subdivision of a State, or any band of Indians in this country, which has a right today to come to the United States Government and say that the Government owes them money, in view of what we have been doing for the people of all the States since the depression started. They might have spent some money in behalf of the United States Government years ago, but let us consider the billions of dollars that the United States Government has spent in behalf of the people of the States in the last few years. I think we should take that into consideration in handling all claim bills. I ask the gentleman if he will not request this bill go over without prejudice until I can get a report from the General Accounting Office.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Suppose we incorporate in this bill an amendment in substance as the gentleman has indicated, that before the payment of the sum authorized to be appropriated shall be made, there shall be deducted therefrom such sum as the Secretary of the Interior shall determine has been gratuitously expended for the benefit of said Indians.

Mr. COCHRAN. I will not let the Secretary of the Interior, with all due respect to that gentleman, decide this question. It must be decided by the Comptroller General of the United States. I want to get a report from the Comptroller General of the United States. I am not going to let the bill go through otherwise, and if the gentleman does not want it to go over without prejudice, I propose to object.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. Yes.

Mr. TABER. This is the same bill, except that it is a House bill instead of a Senate bill, which we defeated on a roll call, when the Committee on Indian Affairs had the call in the last days of the last session.

Mr. COCHRAN. I thank the gentleman from New York. I say to the gentleman from Utah, and for the information of the House, that the Congress has referred to the Court of Claims 114 resolutions setting aside statute of limitations, to give the Court of Claims power to determine claims of Indians against the United States, and the total amount involved in those 114 resolutions is three and a quarter billions of dollars. I repeat the sum, three and a quarter billions—not millions—of dollars.

You have referred those bills to the United States Court of Claims. It should be stopped. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

RICHMOND NATIONAL BATTLEFIELD PARK

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1415, to provide for the establishment of the Richmond National Battlefield Park, in the State of Virginia, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WOODRUM). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I tried to have the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] yield so that I could ask him a question a moment ago. I know the gentleman from Missouri wants to be fair. The gentleman referred to a bill that was defeated after it had been found that the bill had been paid. I hope the gentleman did not mean that, because the bill was withdrawn.

Mr. COCHRAN. I meant "withdrawn", instead of "defeated", and I will change my remarks to read that way, but is it not true that the letter I received from the Comptroller General showed that the money had been paid before I was born?

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. The gentleman will have the RECORD show that the bill was withdrawn, instead of defeated?

Mr. COCHRAN. Yes; but it was paid, and that is the reason it was withdrawn. If the Committee on Indian Affairs will refer all such bills to the Comptroller General, a representative of the Congress, as well as to the Department of the Interior, and consider the Comptroller General's report, we will not have any trouble, because when you get his report I do not think you will report such bills.

The bill that was withdrawn the Commissioner of Indian Affairs recommended that it be paid, but the Comptroller General informed me it had already been paid. That shows you the Commissioner of Indian Affairs does not have sufficient records to report on Indian claim bills.

I am acting at the request of the Committee on Expenditures, of which I am chairman. I have no personal interest in the matter other than to protect the taxpayers of the country. Surely none of us would like to pay a bill twice. Why ask the Government?

Mr. RICH. Reserving the right to object, are we discussing Calendar No. 302?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. RICH. May I ask whoever has charge of this bill whether a committee was formed, under a bill which was presented to the Committee on Public Lands last year, giving the Secretary of the Interior power to create a commission to determine what monuments or parks should be established in the United States; and if so, was this bill presented to that committee or commission, and did that committee or commission act on it?

Mr. MONTAGUE. This bill was offered before that bill to which the gentleman referred was offered.

Mr. RICH. Then we have a bill giving the Secretary of the Interior and his committee the power to recommend to Congress what monuments should be established. Why not present it to the committee? Now, here we have three or four of these bills coming right along in a row. Are we going to permit every Member of Congress to say that we must have monuments established or parks established in our particular districts? If so, what is going to be the expense of those monuments and where are we going to get the money, and how much is it going to eventually cost in succeeding Congresses to take care of those particular monuments?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I may say to the gentleman that there is a question whether this is a monument; whether battlefield parks are monuments. I do not know, but I am advised that the Secretary of the Interior takes the ground that they are not monuments.

Mr. RICH. Has the Secretary of the Interior recommended that this bill be passed?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The appropriate department recommended it. I do not know whether the Secretary did or not, but the Department has recommended that the bill be passed.

Mr. RICH. What is it going to cost to establish this park?

Mr. MONTAGUE. This is a bill that rounds out what is known as Battlefield Park, as far as my own district is concerned. The State of Virginia owns the property now. Some gentlemen in my own town, some of them old Confederate soldiers, bought it and presented it to the State.

Mr. RICH. The State of Virginia owns this park?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes; and wishes to present it to the National Government.

Mr. RICH. So that the National Government will bear the expense of maintaining it. You have more parks in Virginia than in any other State in the country. It is about time that we stop creating parks in Virginia. Eventually Virginia will be nothing but a park, and we up in Pennsylvania, my taxpayers, will have to support it.

Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MONTAGUE. May I ask the gentleman if he will let this bill go over without prejudice?

Mr. RICH. I will let the bill go over without prejudice, but I am going to object to every one of these park bills on the calendar.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

COLONIAL NATIONAL MONUMENT, VA.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5722, to provide for the addition or additions of certain lands to the Colonial National Monument in the State of Virginia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman kindly take the same position that he did before, and let this go over without prejudice?

Mr. RICH. I will do that.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then I ask that the bill go over without prejudice, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

THE HOMESTEAD NATIONAL MONUMENT OF AMERICA, GAGE COUNTY, NEBR.

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1307, to establish the Homestead National Monument of America in Gage County, Nebr.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. LUCKEY. Will the gentleman allow this bill to be passed over without prejudice?

Mr. RICH. I will do that, but I will be here the next time to object.

Mr. LUCKEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

TWENTY-FIRST AMENDMENT

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8368, to enforce the twenty-first amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the author of the bill I ask unanimous consent that it may go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

SHIPMENT OF PRIVATELY OWNED AUTOMOBILES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3421, to authorize credit in disbursing officers' accounts covering shipment of privately owned automobiles from October 12, 1927, to October 10, 1929.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, will some member of the Committee on Military Affairs undertake to explain the bill?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I may state to the gentleman from Kansas that in 1927 the War Department issued a regulation which permitted officers to ship their automobiles under the general head of authorized baggage. The regulation was held by the Judge Advocate General of the Army to be in conformity with existing law. It meant that the officers could have their automobiles shipped by the Government without expense to themselves. In 1929 the Comptroller General took a view opposite to that entertained by the Judge Advocate General and held that the transportation of these automobiles must be paid for by the officers of the Army. This being the case, the money that had been expended by the Government in transporting these automobiles was charged up against the disbursing officers of the Army who had permitted the different shipments. As I understand from the letter of the Secretary of War, the officers whose automobiles were shipped have reimbursed the Government for the expenses of these shipments.

The purpose of this bill is simply to relieve the disbursing officers from being charged with these expenditures.

Mr. HOPE. In other words, this bill will not cost the Government of the United States anything?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No. I call the gentleman's attention to the statement of the Secretary of War, in which he says:

> The personnel concerned have been required to reimburse the Government for excess rate on automobiles over and above the rate on household goods.

The Secretary of War then goes on to say:

> The War Department seeks enactment of the proposed legislation, which will allow the items, will relieve personnel of a liability incurred through no fault of their own, and will have no other effect.

Mr. HOPE. This would require the disbursing officers to refund to these Army officers the amounts that have been paid in.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I do not so understand it. I understand this bill really takes care of a matter of bookkeeping, that it requires no further appropriation or the expenditure of any money on the part of the Federal Government. I understand, furthermore, that the money that was paid has been reimbursed by the officers for whose benefit it was paid.

Mr. HOPE. If this be the case, I cannot understand why the legislation is necessary.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Because the Comptroller General charged these amounts against the disbursing officers, and these charges still stand against the disbursing officers. The only way they can secure relief, as I understand it, is through an act of Congress.

Mr. HOPE. If the money has been paid in by the officers in question, are not the books of the disbursing officers now in balance so far as these accounts are concerned?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No; as I understand it these charges are still standing today against these disbursing officers.

Mr. HOPE. The gentleman, then, understands the legislation to be simply a matter of clearing up these accounts on the books of the officers, and that it does not involve the repayment of the amounts which have been paid in by these officers?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. That is my information from the War Department, I may say to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOPE. It does not in any way authorize the carrying of these automobiles as baggage in the future at Government expense?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No.

Mr. HOPE. It does not change the law or the decision of the Comptroller General?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No. The Secretary of War makes that clear in his letter.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized to allow transportation accounts for private automobiles of officers, warrant officers, nurses, enlisted men, or civilian employees shipped as their authorized baggage allowance from October 12, 1927, to October 10, 1929, and within the authorized weight allowance, at classification rates charged by the transportation companies: Provided, That where any amounts have been collected for shipments made during such period of the difference between classification rates and household-goods rates as authorized by existing law, the payment, upon presentation of claims therefor, of amounts thus collected to those from whom collected is authorized and directed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SARATOGA NATIONAL HISTORICAL PARK (NEW YORK)

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 89, to provide for the creation of the Saratoga National Historical Park in the State of New York, and for other purposes.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

UNIFORM SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1425, to amend section 80 of chapter 9 of an act to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice because there is another bill on the calendar that will probably serve the same purpose as this one.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there are a great many amendments that have been offered to the Bankruptcy Act. Is it not possible to get all of these amendments to that act in one bill, so that the act may be intelligently and logically amended at one time?

Mr. MILLER. That is the very reason I am asking that this bill be passed over. This bill applies to only one district in South Carolina.

Mr. O'MALLEY. There are other amendments to the Bankruptcy Act?

Mr. MILLER. Only one other amendment to this particular section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

LAW CLERKS IN UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURTS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6376, to amend section 118 of the Judicial Code to provide for the appointment of law clerks to United States district court judges.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask a member of the Judiciary Committee to explain this bill and give us some information?

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I am a member of the Judiciary Committee, but I do not know that I can answer the gentleman's question. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice, because there is some little contention with reference to this matter.

Mr. O'MALLEY. The report on this bill is very incomplete as to the need for these clerks in the various districts.

Mr. MILLER. I may say that I did not draw the report and I am not defending the bill.

Mr. O'MALLEY. May I say, with all deference to the gentleman's committee, that if the bill does come up I propose to object to its consideration?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

OFFICERS ON THE RETIRED LIST OF THE NAVY AND MARINE CORPS

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 2774, for the relief of certain officers on the retired list of the Navy and Marine Corps who have been commended for their performance of duty in actual combat with the enemy during the World War.

Mr. MARSHALL. May I ask someone to give us an idea as to the amount involved?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. This does not increase the pay of any officer.

Mr. MARSHALL. When an officer is elevated to a higher rank, does not that automatically increase his salary?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The bill states very positively that there may be no increase in pay. As a matter of fact, if it were not so stated, it would happen in very few instances because the pay is based on longevity of service and not rank. This bill is recommended by the Department and merely takes care of the officers who were wounded in action and retired on account of physical disability.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. How many officers will be affected?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The bill has been unanimously reported by the committee. There are only 78 in the whole of the naval service.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all officers of the Navy and Marine Corps who have been retired or who may hereafter be retired for physical disability and who have been commended for their performance of duty in actual combat with the enemy during the World War by the head of the executive department under whose jurisdiction such duty was performed shall be placed upon the retired list with the rank of the next higher grade: Provided, That such promotion shall not carry with it any increase of pay.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RETIREMENT AND ANNUITIES OF CIVILIAN MEMBERS OF UNITED STATES NAVAL ACADEMY

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8140, to provide for the retirement and retirement annuities of civilian members of the teaching staffs at the United States Naval Academy and the Postgraduate School, the United States Naval Academy.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to substitute the bill S. 2845 for the House bill, which is identical in language.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That civilian members of the teaching staffs of the United States Naval Academy and Postgraduate School, whose employment commences from and after the date of approval of this act, shall, as a part of their contracts of employment, be required to carry, during such employment, a deferred annuity policy, having no cash surrender or loan provision, from a joint-stock life-insurance corporation, incorporated under the laws of any State of the United States, which has a charter restriction that its business must be conducted without profit to its stockholders.

SEC. 2. Toward the purchase of said deferred annuity each member of such teaching staffs shall be required to register a monthly allotment through the Navy Allotment Office, Navy Department, Washington, D. C., equivalent in amount to 10 percent of his monthly basic salary: Provided, That for each month such allotment is registered the pay accounts of such member shall be credited monthly from such appropriations as may be made for this purpose with an additional sum equivalent to 5 percent of his monthly basic salary.

SEC. 3. The retiring age for all civilian members of the teaching staffs set forth in this act shall be the 30th day of June following their sixty-fifth birthday, or any date between their sixty-fifth birthday and the following 30th day of June upon which their employment may be terminated: Provided, That in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy such retiring age may be extended to not beyond the seventieth birthday in individual and special cases.

SEC. 4. Civilian members of the teaching staffs of the Naval Academy and Postgraduate School, who are so employed on the date of approval of this act, may, at their own request, if made within 60 days thereafter to the Secretary of the Navy, participate in the benefits under the provisions of sections 1 and 2 of this act. Each such member of the teaching staffs who so participates and who, upon reaching the date of retirement as set forth in section 3 of this act has an insufficient accumulation of premium payments to his credit to have purchased for him an annuity of $1,200 per annum, shall be paid by the Secretary of the Navy, from such appropriations as may be made for such purpose, such amounts that, together with his purchased annuity, will make his total annuity $1,200 per annum. Each such member of the teaching staffs, who so participates and who is forced to retire for physical incapacity prior to his reaching the prescribed retirement age, shall be paid by the Secretary of the Navy, from such appropriations as may be made for such purpose, such amounts which, together with his purchased annuity, will make his total annuity equivalent to an amount, not exceeding $1,200 per annum, which would have been due him had the provisions of this act been in effect on the rate of his original employment: Provided, That each such member of the teaching staffs who is so employed on the date of approval of this act and who is entitled to retirement and retirement benefits under the provisions of the Civil Service Retirement Act of 1920, as amended, may elect to continue thereunder, or he may elect to participate in the benefits under the provisions of this section; but in the event that he elects to participate in the benefits under the provisions of this section, no further deductions shall be made from his pay for credit to the civil-service retirement fund, and the Civil Service Commission shall close his account with such fund under the same provisions as though he voluntarily separated himself from the Federal service, except that the amount of such credit will be retained in the civil-service retirement fund and remain subject to claim by, and payment to, him, his beneficiary, or his estate only in the event of his separation from the Federal service by death or otherwise before retirement under the provisions of this act, and then only in the amount by which such credit exceeds the total amount of 5 percent of his basic salary which may have been credited to his monthly pay accounts under the provisions of section 2 of this act.

SEC. 5. Civilian members of the teaching staffs of the Naval Academy and Postgraduate School shall include instructors, assistant chief instructors, chief instructors, assistant professors, asociate profesors, and professors.

SEC. 6. The Secretary of the Navy is authorized and directed to make such regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such amounts as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H. R. 8140) was laid on the table.

DISPOSAL OF MATERIAL NO LONGER NEEDED BY THE NAVY

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1381, to amend Public Law No. 249, Seventy-first Congress, entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to dispose of material no longer needed by the Navy."

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Public Law No. 249, Seventy-first Congress, approved May 23, 1930, entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to dispose of material no longer needed by the Navy", is amended by striking out the word "and" before the word "tools" and inserting after the word "tools" a comma followed by "boats and boat equipment."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

SUBMARINE AND DIVING DUTY IN THE NAVY

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5729, to amend the act entitled "An act to provide additional pay for personnel of the United States Navy assigned to duty on submarines and to diving duty", to include officers assigned to duty at submarine training tanks and diving units, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOPE and Mr. TERRY rose.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to have the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DARDEN] give us some idea of the number of officers and men who will be affected by this bill and the amount it will likely cost per annum.

Mr. DARDEN. It is difficult to state the number of officers and men affected. It will cost approximately $14,500 per annum. The bill is designed to allow those men who are assigned to private shipyards where submarines are under construction to draw diving pay after the trials begin, but before the ship is commissioned.

Mr. TERRY. May I ask the gentleman whether or not the officers who are to get this increased pay are doing the diving themselves?

Mr. DARDEN. Yes; officers and men are instructing in the diving tanks of the Navy and performing submarine duty in the trials. There is a great deal of work now going on in an effort to minimize the danger of loss of life in submarine collisions. The officers who are running the schools and actually performing the work are to be compensated, as well as those who are attached to ships that are on trial, but have not been commissioned, although the men are actively engaged in diving work.

Mr. TERRY. These men are actually doing the diving work.

Mr. DARDEN. Yes. This is additional pay for hazard. It is now being received by a number of people in the Navy, and the Naval Affairs Committee believed that it should be extended to all those who are really subjected to the hazards. It is to this end that the bill has been reported.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that at the present time the Navy personnel, who take over these boats in the Government shipyards before they are commissioned, do receive this addtional pay?

Mr. DARDEN. Yes.

Mr. HOPE. And this bill simply puts those who take over such boats from private shipyards on the same basis?

Mr. DARDEN. Yes. The trials are run in private yards before the ship is accepted and commissioned.

Mr. HOPE. And the men who man these ships during the trials are assuming the same risk and dangers that they do after the ship is commissioned.

Mr. DARDEN. They are proportionately the same. Of course, a ship is on constant duty usually after the ship is commissioned. The trials are fewer, but the hazard in diving is the same. It is probably greater because it is a new ship.

Mr. HOPE. I have no objection, and withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WOODRUM). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill (S. 2257) be considered in lieu of the House bill.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to provide additional pay for personnel of the United States Navy assigned to duty on submarines and to diving duty" (45 Stat. 412; U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 34, sec. 886) is hereby amended by inserting after the words "submarine of the Navy" in line 3 of said act the words "including submarines under construction for the Navy from the time builders' trials commence, or on duty at submarine escape training tanks, the Navy Deep Sea Diving School, or the Naval Experimental Diving Unit", and by inserting after the words "submarine of the Navy" in lines 6 and 7 of said act the words "including submarines under construction for the Navy from the time builders' trials commence", so that the said act as amended will read as follows: "That hereafter all officers of the Navy on duty on board a submarine of the Navy, including submarines under construction for the Navy from the time builders' trials commence, or on duty at submarine escape training tanks, the Navy Deep Sea Diving School, or the Naval Experimental Diving Unit, shall, while so serving, receive 25 percent additional of the pay for their rank and service as now provided by law; and an enlisted man of the United States Navy assigned to duty aboard a submarine of the Navy, including submarines under construction for the Navy from the time builders' trials commence, or to the duty of diving, shall, in lieu of the additional pay now authorized, receive pay, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, at the rate of not less than $5 per month and not exceeding $30 per month, in addition to the pay and allowances of his rating and service: Provided, That divers employed in actual salvage operations in depths of over 90 feet shall, in addition to the foregoing, receive the sum of $5 per hour for each hour or fraction thereof so employed.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

UNITED STATES LIGHTHOUSE SUPPLY DEPOT, ST. JOSEPH, MICH.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5916, to authorize the conveyance by the United States to the State of Michigan of the former United States lighthouse supply depot, St. Joseph, Mich., for State naval force purposes.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby authorized and directed to convey to the State of Michigan for State naval force purposes all right, title, and interest of the United States in and to a tract of land containing 1.724 acres, more or less, situated in section 23, township 4 south, range 19 west, in the county of Berrien, State of Michigan, formerly embraced within the United States lighthouse supply depot at St. Joseph, Mich., and transferred to the control and jurisdiction of the Navy Department for naval purposes by the act of Congress approved July 1, 1918 (40 Stat. 704, 719). Such conveyance shall contain the express condition that if said State of Michigan shall at any time cease to use such tract of land for State naval force purposes or shall alienate or attempt to alienate such tract, title thereto shall revert to the United States, and the deed or instrument of conveyance shall recite the reversionary right herein reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING THE APPOINTMENT OF MIDSHIPMEN FROM AMONG HONOR GRADUATES OF HONOR SCHOOLS

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 7486) to authorize the appointment of midshipmen from among honor graduates of honor schools and from among members of the Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, this bill is recommended by the Navy Department. It is similar to the measure which provides for the appointment from honor schools to West Point. This bill authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to designate from so-called honor schools named by the War Department one midshipman. I will state that there are 20 of those schools in the United States.

A similar bill has been passed regarding the appointment of cadets to West Point. This is on all fours with that bill.

Mr. TERRY. Are these midshipmen appointed by the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. They are designated after they have become honor graduates of these so-called honor schools.

Mr. KELLER. Would this interfere with the appointments to Annapolis by Members of Congress?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. It has no connection with the appointment by Members of Congress to Annapolis.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to appoint not more than 20 midshipmen annually to the Naval Academy from among the honor graduates of educational institutions which are designated as honor schools by the War Department: Provided, That not more than one midshipman shall be appointed in any one year from any one of such schools.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to appoint midshipmen to the Naval Academy from among the members of the Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps: Provided, That not more than one midshipman shall be appointed in any one year from any one of the educational institutions at which a Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps unit is established.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 7, after the word "Department", strike out "Provided, That not more than one midshipman shall be appointed in any one year from any one of such schools" and insert "and the members of the Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps: Provided, That such appointments shall be made under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe."

Strike out all of section 2.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE SILVER SERVICE ON THE U. S. S. "PADUCAH"

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call out of order the bill (H. R. 8872) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to deliver to the custody of the Woman's Club, of the city of Paducah, Ky., the silver service in use on the U. S. S. Paducah. The reason I am asking unanimous consent is that it probably will not be reached today, and the organization is very anxious that the bill should pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia? The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized, in his discretion, to loan to the Woman's Club, of the city of Paducah, Ky., for preservation and exhibition, the silver service which was in use on the U. S. S. Paducah: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States for the delivery of such silver service.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE MUSKOGEE OR CREEK TRIBE OF INDIANS

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 5442, authorizing an appropriation to carry out the provisions of section 26 of the agreement with the Muskogee or Creek Tribe of Indians, approved March 1, 1901.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. COCHRAN. Reserving the right to object, I should like to make a short statement. This bill provides for an appropriation of $600,000 to carry out the provisions of section 26 of an act to ratify and confirm an agreement with certain Indian tribes. I invite attention to the minority report on the bill, signed by Mr. COLLINS, of California, wherein, in part, he says:

A decision of the Court of Claims was rendered on the 25th day of February 1884, wherein the court held on a question of law as a conclusion of law, that all the claims—

I repeat, all the claims—

which the petitioners had against the United States for damages and losses growing out of the late Rebellion were adjusted, settled, and released by the treaty of 1866, which is the treaty herein discussed and the payment thereunder of $100,000, as provided in article III, and that the claimants, having received that sum, are not entitled to be paid any further amount.

Mr. Speaker, I am forced to object.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I am the author of this bill, and the statements made by the gentleman are not absolutely correct. I should like to answer them. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman. I think the gentleman should not say that I am incorrect. I merely read the minority views, and if anyone is incorrect, it is the author of the minority views.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, this bill is based on a treaty, a treaty made between the Creek Indians and the Government of the United States. The hundred-thousand-dollar provision which the gentleman refers to is referred to in the treaty as follows:

One hundred thousand dollars shall be paid to soldiers that enlisted in the Federal Army and the loyal refugee Indians and freedmen who were driven from their homes by the rebel forces, to reimburse them in proportion to their respective losses, etc.

The treaty further provides that immediately after the ratification thereof the United States shall ascertain the amount due the respective soldiers who enlisted in the Federal Army. In other words, the $100,000 was paid only as good-will money. A committee was appointed. That committee made a survey and came back and reported the actual damages sustained by those Indians at five million dollars plus.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, let me ask the gentleman to explain why the court said "all the claims" and also advise the House how much money the Government of the United States has advanced in gratuities to the Indians that he is representing. Of course, if there is any amount due, the Indians are dead long ago, and it will be grandchildren that would benefit as well as lawyers.

Mr. NICHOLS. Oh, no. Many of the heirs are still living. In any event, this is a contract entered into by the gentleman's great Government and mine with a tribe of Indians in Oklahoma. After they had fixed this amount they came back and by the action of this Congress the Senate of the United States was appointed as an arbitration body, and the Senate agreed that the Government owed these Indians $1,200,000, and such a bill was passed, but when it came to the House conferees were asked for, and in the conference the amount was cut down to $600,000, and it was rammed down the throats of the Indians; and this is only asking for the balance of the $1,200,000 that was agreed to by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, the Comptroller General of the United States has the reports, and the Department of the Interior does not have them; and, until I have a report from the Comptroller, I shall object.

Mr. NICHOLS. I will agree with the gentleman to do what the Comptroller says to do on this bill.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is always fair and he is fair now in awaiting the Comptroller's report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard, and the Clerk will call the next bill.

SURVEY OF ARKANSAS RIVER AND FOURCHE BAYOU, ARK.

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 7995) to authorize a preliminary examination and survey of the Arkansas River and Fourche Bayou with a view to the control of floods in the vicinity of Little Rock and North Little Rock, Ark.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, to inquire if it is not true that the authority is already vested in the Army engineers to do the thing required in this bill.

Mr. TERRY. Part of the examination has been made, but so far as the Fourche Bayou is concerned it has not been made. This gives an authorization, and not an appropriation of money or anything of that sort. It calls attention of the Army engineers to the necessity for this examination. The committee investigated it and there seems to be no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a preliminary examination to be made of the Arkansas River and Fourche Bayou with a view to the control of floods in the vicinity of Little Rock and North Little Rock, Ark., in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of an act entitled "An act to provide for control of the floods of the Mississippi River and of the Sacramento River, Calif., and for other purposes", approved March 1, 1917, the cost thereof to be paid from appropriations heretofore or hereafter made for examinations, surveys, and contingencies of rivers and harbors.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title was amended to read: "A bill to authorize a preliminary examination of the Arkansas River and Fourche Bayou with a view to the control of floods in the vicinity of Little Rock and North Little Rock, Ark."

MONUMENT TO SPANISH COLONIAL MISSIONS IN TEXAS, ETC.

The Clerk called House Joint Resolution 211, to create a commission to study and report on the feasibility of establishing a national monument, or monuments, in the territory occupied by the Spanish colonial missions in the States of Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, and California.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. RICH. I object.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection so that I can propose an amendment which might meet with the gentleman's approval?

Mr. RICH. I will withhold it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the gentleman reserves the right to object until the amendment is read for information?

Mr. RICH. Yes; I should like to reserve the objection until I hear the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will read the amendment for information.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment proposed by Mr. MAVERICK: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That a commission is hereby created to be known as the Spanish Colonial Missions Commission, to be composed of two Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the President of the Senate; six Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives; and two members to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of the Interior, ex officio. Any vacancy in the commission shall be filled in the same manner as an original appointment. The members of the commission shall select a chairman from among their number. The commissioners shall receive no compensation for their services. The commission shall cease to exist upon making its report to Congress pursuant to this resolution.

"SEC. 2. The Spanish Colonial Missions Commission is authorized and directed—

"(1) To make a study for the purpose of ascertaining the best methods for the preservation of Spanish colonial architecture, sites, antiquities, art, and culture, and for the collection and making available to the public of historical data, materials, and information with respect thereto, with the view of establishing appropriate monuments, parks, and shrines, encouraging suitable exhibitions, commemorations, and tourist attractions, and promoting domestic travel and patriotic knowledge; and

"(2) To submit to Congress, as soon as practicable, a report containing the results of its study, together with its recommendations for such legislation as it deems necessary or appropriate.

"SEC. 3. The commission may appoint and fix the compensation, without regard to the civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, of a secretary, historian, and such other employees, and may make such expenditures, including expenditures for actual travel and subsistence expenses of commissioners and employees (not exceeding $5 for subsistence expense for any one person for any one calendar day) while absent from their places of residence or designated posts of duty on the business of the commission, and including printing and binding, as may be necessary for the execution of its functions under this resolution. All expenses of the commission shall be allowed and paid upon the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the chairman of the commission.

"SEC. 4. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $15,000 to be expended by the commission in accordance with the provisions of this resolution.

"Amend the title to read as follows: 'To create a commission to study and make a report and recommendations to Congress on preserving and making available to the public sites, data, materials, and information relative to Spanish colonial architecture, antiquities, arts, and culture.'"

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I should like to say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK] that this would only create another commission. The Democratic platform called for the elimination of commissions. Last year we established a commission to determine overlapping duties——

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the regular order.

Mr. RICH. That Commission was appointed last year. We also appointed a committee to investigate——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order has been demanded. Is there objection?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PLANT QUARANTINE LAWS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8495, to amend certain plant-quarantine laws.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the third sentence of the second paragraph under the subheading "Enforcement of the Plant Quarantine Act" under the heading "Miscellaneous" of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916", approved March 4, 1915, is amended to read as follows: "If the plants or plant products are found upon inspection to be free from injurious pests and not in violation of a plant-quarantine law or plant-quarantine regulation of the United States Department of Agriculture or of the State of destination pertaining to such injurious pests, or if infected shall be disinfected by said official, they shall upon payment of postage therefor be returned to the postmaster at the place of inspection to be forwarded to the person to whom they are addressed; but if found to be infected with injurious pests and incapable of satisfactory disinfection or in violation of a plant-quarantine law or plant-quarantine regulation of the United States Department of Agriculture or of the State of destination pertaining to such injurious pests, the State inspector shall so notify the postmaster at the place of inspection who shall promptly notify the sender of said plants or plant products that they will be returned to him upon his request and at his expense, or in default of such request that they will be turned over to the State authorities for destruction."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 9, after the word "products", insert "(including seed)."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CLAIMS OF KIOWA, COMANCHE, AND APACHE TRIBES OF INDIANS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6818, conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, examine, adjudicate, and enter judgment in any claim which the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Tribes of Indians may have against the United States, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

CLAIMS OF WINNEBAGO TRIBE OF INDIANS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6740, to amend an act approved December 17, 1928, entitled "An act conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, examine, adjudicate, and enter judgment thereon in claims which the Winnebago Tribe of Indians may have against the United States, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

DISPOSAL OF SMUGGLED MERCHANDISE

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8624, to provide for the disposal of smuggled merchandise, to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to require imported articles to be marked in order that smuggled merchandise may be identified, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That where under existing law any forfeiture, condemnation, or abandonment of watches, watch movements, or parts thereof under the customs laws is declared by the collector of customs, or any forfeiture is decreed by any court, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to sell at public auction for a price not less than the fair value thereof, plus legal duty imposed thereon, together with all costs, including transportation and court costs, or, in lieu thereof, to destroy said merchandise, after removal for governmental accounts of all economically recoverable precious stones, gold, silver, or platinum: Provided, That payment of compensation to informers as now provided by law shall be paid in the case of any merchandise recovered to the Government and sold at public auction, or in case of destruction of such merchandise the amount provided by law shall be determined upon a fair value thereof: Provided, however, That no such amount shall exceed $50,000. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

SEC. 2. After 90 days after the date of the enactment of this act, no watch movement, complete or incomplete, shall be permitted entry into the United States unless an unduplicated consecutive number, together with the manufacturer's or importer's name, is marked legibly on the barrel, bridge, or pillar plate be registered with the Secretary of the Treasury for identification purposes, as he may by rules and regulations prescribe.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BILLS OF INTERPLEADER

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1277, to amend section 24 of the Judicial Code by conferring on district courts additional jurisdiction of bills of interpleader.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subsection 26 of section 24 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U. S. C., title 28, sec. 41 (26)), be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"(26) Original jurisdiction of bills of interpleader—Twenty-sixth: (a) Of suits in equity begun by bills of interpleader or bills in the nature of bills of interpleader duly verified, filed by any person, firm, corporation, association, or society having in his or its custody or possession money or property of the value of $500 or more, or having issued a note, bond, certificate, policy of insurance, or other instrument of the value or amount of $500 or more, or providing for the delivery or payment or the loan of money or property of such amount or value, or being under any obligation written or unwritten to the amount of $500 or more, if—

"(1) Two or more adverse claimants, citizens of different States, are claiming to be entitled to such money or property, or to any one or more of the benefits arising by virtue of any note, bond, certificate, policy, or other instrument, or arising by virtue of any such obligation; and

"(ii) The complainant (a) has deposited such money or property or has paid the amount of or the loan or other value of such instrument or the amount due under such obligation into the registry of the court, there to abide the judgment of the court; or (b) has given bond payable to the clerk of the court in such amount and with such surety as the court or judge may deem proper, conditioned upon the compliance by the complainant with the future order or decree of the court with respect to the subject matter of the controversy."

Such a suit in equity may be entertained although the titles or claims of the conflicting claimants do not have a common origin, or are not identical, but are adverse to and independent of one another.

"(b) Such a suit may be brought in the district court of the district in which one or more of such claimants resides or reside.

"(c) Notwithstanding any provision of the Judicial Code to the contrary, said court shall have power to issue its process for all such claimants and to issue an order of injunction against each of them, enjoining them from instituting or prosecuting any suit or proceeding in any State court or in any United States court on account of such money or property or on such instrument or obligation until the further order of the court; which process and order of injunction shall be returnable at such time as the said court or a judge thereof shall determine and shall be addressed to and served by the United States marshals for the respective districts wherein said claimants reside or may be found.

"(d) Said court shall hear and determine the cause and shall discharge the complainant from further liability; and shall make the injunction permanent and enter all such other orders and decrees as may be necessary or convenient to carry out and enforce the same.

"(e) In any action at law in a United States District Court against any person, firm, corporation, association, or society, such defendant may be set up by way of equitable defense, in accordance with section 274b of the Judicial Code (U. S. C., title 28, sec. 398), any matter which would entitle such person, firm, corporation, association, or society to file an original or ancillary bill of interpleader or bill in the nature of interpleader in the same court or in any other United States District Court against the plaintiff in such action at law and one or more other adverse claimants, under the provisions of paragraph (a) of this subsection or any other provision of the Judicial Code and the rules of court made pursuant thereto. The defendant may join as parties to such equitable defense any claimant or claimants who are not already parties to such action at law. The district court in which such equitable defense is interposed shall thereby possess the powers conferred upon district courts by paragraphs (c) and (d) of this subsection and by section 274b of the Judicial Code."

"SEC. 2. The act entitled 'An act authorizing casualty companies, surety companies, insurance companies or associations, or fraternal or beneficial societies to file bills of interpleader', approved May 8, 1926 (U. S. C., Supp. III, title 28, sec. 41 (26)), is hereby repealed. Said repeal shall not affect any act done or any right, accruing or accrued in any suit or proceeding had or commenced under said act hereby repealed, prior to the passage of this act, but all such acts or rights, suits, or proceedings shall continue and be valid and may be prosecuted and enforced in the same manner as if said act had not been repealed hereby."

With the following committee amendments:

On page 1, strike out lines 3, 4, and 5 and insert in lieu thereof "That section 24 of the Judicial Code, as amended, is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following:".

On page 4, line 22, strike out the word "Code" and insert "Code."."

On page 5, in line 10, strike out the word "hereby" " and insert "hereby."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title was amended to read as follows: "An act to amend section 24 of the Judicial Code by conferring on district courts additional jurisdiction of bills of interpleader and of bills in the nature of interpleader."

COOS HEAD RIVER AND HARBOR RESERVATION

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 978, authorizing the Secretary of War to convey to the University of Oregon certain lands forming a part of the Coos Head River and Harbor Reservation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to convey by quitclaim deed to the University of Oregon, State of Oregon, subject to the conditions hereinafter specified, the following described part of the Coos Head River and Harbor Reservation situated on the south shore of the entrance to Coos

Bay in Coos County, Oreg.: All of lot 3, section 2, township 26 south, range 14 west, Willamette meridian, except the west 750 feet of said lot heretofore conveyed to the University of Oregon: Provided, That such conveyance shall not be made until the Civilian Conservation Corps has relinquished the use and occupancy of said land.

SEC. 2. The lands herein authorized to be conveyed shall be used by the University of Oregon solely for scientific and educational purposes, subject, however, to the right of the United States, in case of war or other emergency, to assume control of, hold, use, and occupy said lands or any part thereof for any and all military, naval, or other governmental purposes, and subject at all times to the rights of the United States stated in section 3 hereof. The deed executed by the Secretary of War under the provisions of section 1 of this act shall contain the express condition that if the University of Oregon shall at any time attempt to alienate said lands that same shall revert to the United States.

SEC. 3. The lands herein authorized to be conveyed to the University of Oregon shall at all times be subject to the right of the United States to occupy and use such part thereof as are now or may hereafter be needed for jetty site or sites, for rights-of-way for tramways to such jetty site or sites, and for ingress and egress by persons engaged in river and harbor work; and the United States shall at all times have prior right to three-fourths of the natural flow of streams draining lots 2 and 3.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS POTOMAC RIVER AT DAHLGREN, VA.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8025, authorizing the George Washington Memorial Bridge Public Corporation, its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Potomac River at or near Dahlgren, Va.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may we have an explanation of the bill?

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, may I say that I have been asked to request unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice?

Mr. Speaker, I had occasion to look into this matter, and find that this bill is really a part of the existing law, having been provided for in the omnibus bill at the close of the last session.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be passed over without prejudice.

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSISSIPPI RIVER AT ST. LOUIS, MO.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8609, authorizing the county of St. Clair, in the State of Illinois, and the State of Illinois, or either of them, to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Mississippi River at or near a point on Broadway between Florida and Mullanphy Streets in the city of St. Louis, Mo., and a point opposite thereto in the town of Stites, in the county of St. Clair, State of Illinois, and connecting with St. Clair Avenue extended in said town.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to promote interstate commerce, improve the postal service, and provide for military and other purposes, the county of St. Clair, in the State of Illinois, and the State of Illinois, or either of them, be, and are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Mississippi River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near a point on Broadway between Florida and Mullanphy Streets in the city of St. Louis, Mo., and a point opposite thereto in the town of Stites, in the county of St. Clair, State of Illinois, and connecting with St. Clair Avenue extended in said town, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. There is hereby conferred upon the county of St. Clair, in the State of Illinois, and the State of Illinois, or either of them, all such rights and powers to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property needed for the location, construction, maintenance, and operation of such bridge and its approaches as are possessed by railroad corporations for railroad purposes or by bridge corporations for bridge purposes in the State in which such real estate or other property is situated, upon making just compensation therefor, to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of such State and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation or expropriation of property for public purposes in such State.

SEC. 3. The said county of St. Clair, in the State of Illinois, and the State of Illinois, or either of them, are hereby authorized to fix and charge tolls for transit over such bridge, and the rates of toll so fixed shall be the legal rates until changed by the Secretary of War under the authority contained in the act of March 23, 1906.

SEC. 4. In fixing the rates of toll to be charged for the use of such bridge the same shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the cost of such bridge and its approaches, including reasonable interest and financing cost, as soon as possible, under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 30 years from the completion thereof. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the cost of the bridge and its approaches, the expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 5. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill authorizing the county of St. Clair, in the State of Illinois, to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Mississippi River, at or near a point on Broadway between Florida and Mullanphy Streets in the city of St. Louis, Mo., and a point opposite thereto in the town of Stites, in the county of St. Clair, State of Illinois, and connecting with St. Clair Avenue extended in said town."

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 5, strike out the words "and the."

Page 1, line 6, strike out the words "State of Illinois, or either of them", and strike out the word "are" and insert in lieu thereof the word "is."

Page 2, line 13, strike out the words "and the State of Illinois."

Page 2, line 14, strike out the words "or either of them."

Page 3, line 2, strike out the words "and the State of Illinois, or either of them, are" and insert in lieu thereof the word "is."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill authorizing the county of St. Clair, in the State of Illinois, to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Mississippi River at or near a point on Broadway between Florida and Mullanphy Streets in the city of St. Louis, Mo., and a point opposite thereto in the town of Stites, in the county of St. Clair, State of Illinois, and connecting with St. Clair Avenue extended in said town."

BRIDGE ACROSS OHIO RIVER, SHAWNEETOWN, ILL.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8680, to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Shawneetown, Gallatin County, Ill., and a point opposite thereto in Union County, Ky.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Shawneetown, Gallatin County, Ill., and a point opposite thereto in Union County, Ky., authorized to be built by the city of Shawneetown, Ill., by an act of Congress approved June 4, 1934, are hereby extended 1 and 3 years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER, MIAMI, MO.

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 2950, granting the consent of Congress to the county of Saline, Mo., to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Missouri River at or near Miami, Mo.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the county of Saline, Mo., to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Missouri River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near

Miami, Mo., in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. If tolls are charged for the use of such bridge, the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the cost of the bridge and its approaches, including reasonable interest and financing cost, as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 20 years from the completion thereof. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of tolls shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the costs of the bridge and its approaches, the expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected, shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 3. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DELAWARE RIVER JOINT TOLL BRIDGE COMMISSION

The Clerk called the next resolution, H. J. Res. 297, granting consent of Congress to a compact or agreement between the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey creating the Delaware River Joint Toll Bridge Commission and specifying the powers and duties thereof.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the House joint resolution, as follows:

Whereas, pursuant to act no. 332 of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, approved June 25, 1931, as amended by act no. 138, approved May 18, 1933, and chapter 215 of the Laws of New Jersey, approved June 11, 1934, the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey have entered into a certain compact or agreement, which said compact or agreement has been duly executed and delivered by the Governor of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania on behalf of the said Commonwealth and by the Governor of New Jersey on behalf of the State of New Jersey; and

Whereas the aforesaid agreement or compact is in substantially the following form, that is to say:

Whereas the commission on behalf of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, existing by virtue of the act approved the 8th day of May 1919 (Pamphlet Laws, 148), and its supplements and amendments, and the commission, on behalf of the State of New Jersey, existing by virtue of the provisions of the act, approved the 1st day of April 1912 (ch. 297), and its supplements and amendments, acting as a joint commission, have acquired various toll bridges over the Delaware River between the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey; and

Whereas additional bridge facilities between the two States will be required in the future for the accommodation of the public and the development of both States; and

Whereas such additional bridge facilities should be developed without the expenditure of large sums from the public revenues; and

Whereas it is highly desirable that there be a single agency for both States empowered to further the transportation interests of these States with respect to that part of the Delaware River north of the stone arch bridge of the Pennsylvania Railroad from Morrisville to Trenton: Now, therefore,

The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey do hereby solemnly covenant and agree, each with the other, as follows:

ARTICLE I

There is hereby created a body corporate and politic, to be known as the "Delaware River Joint Toll Bridge Commission" (hereinafter in this agreement called the "commission"), which shall consist of the commissioners, on behalf of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, provided for by the act, approved the 8th day of May 1919 (Pamphlet Laws, 148), and its supplements and amendments, for the acquisition of toll bridges over the Delaware River, and of commissioners, on behalf of the State of New Jersey, provided for by the act, approved the 1st day of April 1912 (ch. 397), and its supplements and amendments, for the acquisition of toll bridges over the Delaware River, which said commissions have heretofore been acting as a joint commission by virtue of reciprocal legislation.

No action of the commission shall be binding unless a majority of the members of the commission from Pennsylvania and a majority of the members of the commission from New Jersey shall vote in favor thereof.

The commission shall constitute the public corporate instrumentality of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey for the following public purposes, and shall be deemed to be exercising an essential governmental function in effectuating such purpose, to wit:

(a) The administration, operation, and maintenance of the joint State-owned bridges across the Delaware River between the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey, and located north of the present stone arch bridge of the Pennsylvania Railroad across the Delaware River from Morrisville to Trenton;

(b) The investigation of the necessity for additional bridge communications over the Delaware River north of the said railroad bridge, and the making of such studies, surveys, and estimates as may be necessary to determine the feasibility and cost of such additional bridge communications;

(c) The preparation of plans and specifications for, and location, construction, administration, operation, and maintenance of, such additional bridge communications over the Delaware River, north of the aforesaid railroad bridge, as the commission deems necessary to advance the interests of the two States and to facilitate public travel; and the issuance of bonds and obligations to provide moneys sufficient for the construction of such bridges; and the collection of tolls, rentals, and charges for the redemption of such bonds and obligations, and the payment of interest thereon;

(d) The procurement from the Government of the United States of any consents which may be requisite to enable any project within its powers to be carried out.

ARTICLE II

For the effectuation of its authorized purposes, the commission is hereby granted the following powers:

(a) To have perpetual succession.

(b) To sue and be sued.

(c) To adopt and use an official seal.

(d) To elect a chairman, vice chairman, secretary, and treasurer, and appoint an engineer. The secretary, treasurer, and engineer need not be members of the commission.

(e) To adopt suitable bylaws for the management of its affairs.

(f) To appoint such other officers, agents, and employees as it may require for the performance of its duties.

(g) To determine the qualifications and duties of its appointees, and to fix their compensation.

(h) To enter into contracts.

(i) To acquire, own, hire, use, operate, and dispose of personal property.

(j) To acquire, own, use, lease, operate, and dispose of real property and interest in real property, and to make improvements thereon.

(k) To grant the use of, by franchise, lease, and otherwise, and to make and collect charges for the use of, any property or facility owned or controlled by it.

(l) To borrow money upon its bonds or other obligations, either with or without security.

(m) To exercise the power of eminent domain.

(n) To determine the exact location, system, and character of, and all other matters in connection with, any and all improvements or facilities which it may be authorized to own, construct, establish, effectuate, maintain, operate, or control.

(o) In addition to the foregoing powers, to exercise the powers, duties, authority, and jurisdiction heretofore conferred and imposed upon the aforesaid commissions, hereby constituted a joint commission by reciprocal legislation of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey, with respect to the acquisition of toll bridges over the Delaware River, the management, operation, and maintenance of such bridges, and the location, construction, operation, and maintenance of additional bridge communications over the Delaware River north of the aforesaid railroad bridge of the Pennsylvania Railroad.

(p) To exercise all other powers, not inconsistent with the constitutions of the States of Pennsylvania and New Jersey or of the United States, which may be reasonably necessary or incidental to the effectuation of its authorized purposes or to the exercise of any of the foregoing powers, except the power to levy taxes or assessments for benefits; and generally to exercise, in connection with its property and affairs and in connection with property under its control, any and all powers which might be exercised by a natural person or a private corporation in connection with similar property and affairs.

ARTICLE III

If for any of its authorized purposes (including temporary purposes) the commission shall find it necessary or convenient to acquire for public use any real property in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania or the State of New Jersey, whether for immediate or future use, the commission may, by resolution, determine to acquire such property by a fee simple absolute or a lesser interest, and the said determination shall not be affected by the fact that such property has therefore been taken for or is then devoted to a public use, but the public use in the hands or under the control of the commission shall be deemed superior to the public use in the hands or under the control of any other person, association, or corporation.

If the commission is unable to agree with the owner or owners thereof upon terms for the acquisition of any such real property in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania for any reason whatsoever, then the commission may acquire such real property by the exercise of the right of eminent domain, in the manner provided by the act, approved the 8th day of May 1919 (Pamphlet Laws, 148), entitled "An act providing for the joint acquisition and maintenance by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey of certain toll bridges over the Delaware River", and the acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, relating to the acquisition of interstate toll bridges over the Delaware River.

If the commission is unable to agree with the owner or owners thereof upon terms for the acquisition of any such real property, in the State of New Jersey, for any reason whatsoever, then the commission may acquire such property by the exercise of the right of eminent domain, in the manner provided by the act of the State of New Jersey, entitled "An act authorizing the acquisition and maintaining by the State of New Jersey, in conjunction with the State of Pennsylvania, of toll bridges across the Delaware River; and providing for free travel across the same", approved the 1st day of April 1912 (ch. 297), and the various acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, relating to the acquisition of interstate toll bridges over the Delaware River.

The power of the commission to acquire real property by condemnation or the exercise of the power of eminent domain in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey shall be a continuing power and no exercise thereof shall be deemed to exhaust it.

The commission and its duly authorized agents and employees may enter upon any land, in the Commonwealth or the State of New Jersey, for the purpose of making such surveys, maps, or other examinations thereof as it may deem necessary or convenient for its authorized purposes.

However, anything to the contrary contained in this compact notwithstanding, no property, now or hereafter vested in or held by any county, city, borough, village, township, or other municipality, shall be taken by the commission without the consent of such municipality, unless expressly authorized so to do by the Commonwealth or State in which such municipality is located. All counties, cities, boroughs, villages, townships, and other municipalities, and all public agencies and commissions of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey, notwithstanding any contrary provision of law, are hereby authorized and empowered to grant and convey to the commission upon its request, but not otherwise, upon reasonable terms and conditions, any real property which may be necessary or convenient to the effectuation of its authorized purposes, including real property already devoted to public use.

The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey hereby consent to the use and occupation by the commission of any real property of the said two States, or of either of them, which may be or become necessary or convenient to the effectuation of the authorized purposes of the commission, including lands lying under water and lands already devoted to public use.

The term "real property", as used in this compact, includes lands, structures, franchises, and interests in land, including lands under water and riparian rights, and any and all things and rights usually included within the said term, and includes not only fees simple and absolute but also any and all lesser interests, such as easements, rights-of-way, uses, leases, licenses, and all other incorporeal hereditaments, and every estate, interest, or right, legal or equitable, including terms of years and liens thereon by way of judgments, mortgages, or otherwise, and also claims for damage to real estate.

ARTICLE IV

Notwithstanding any provision of this agreement, the commission shall have no power to pledge the credit of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, or of the State of New Jersey, or of any county, city, borough, village, township, and other municipality of said Commonwealth or State, or to create any debt against said Commonwealth or State or any such municipality.

ARTICLE V

The commission is hereby authorized to make and enforce such rules and regulations, and to establish, levy, and collect (or to authorize by contract, franchise, liens, or otherwise, the establishment, levying, and collection of) such tolls, rates, rents, and other charges, in connection with any such bridge across the Delaware River which it may hereafter construct and operate, as it may deem necessary, proper, desirable, and reasonable, which tolls, rates, rents, and other charges shall be at least sufficient to meet interest and sinking-fund charges on bonds and obligations issued by the commission, and the maintenance of such bridge, and the administrative expenses of the commission properly chargeable to such bridge. The commission is hereby authorized and empowered to pledge such tolls, rates, rents, and other revenues, or any part thereof, as security for the repayment, with interest, of any moneys borrowed by it or advanced to it for any of its authorized purposes, and as security for the satisfaction of any other obligation assumed by it in connection with such loans or advances.

ARTICLE VI

The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey hereby covenant and agree with each other and with the holders of any bonds or other obligations of the commission, for which tolls, rents, rates, or other revenues have been pledged, that, so long as any of said bonds or obligations remain outstanding and unpaid (unless adequate provision is otherwise made by law for the protection of those advancing moneys upon such bonds or obligations), the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey will not diminish or impair the power of the commission to own, operate, and control said properties and facilities, or to establish, levy, and collect tolls, rents, rates, and other charges in connection with such properties and facilities.

The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey hereby covenant and agree with each other and with the holders of any bonds or obligations of the commission, for which tolls, rents, rates, or other revenues shall have been pledged, that the said Commonwealth and State will not authorize or permit the construction, operation, and maintenance of any additional bridge or tunnel for the transportation of passengers by vehicles over the Delaware River by any other person or body than the commission within a distance of 10 miles in either direction from any such toll bridge, measured along the boundary line between the said Commonwealth and the said State.

ARTICLE VII

The bonds or obligations which may be issued by the commission for any of its authorized purposes, and as security for which tolls, rents, rates, and other revenues shall have been pledged, are hereby made securities in which all State and municipal officers and bodies of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey, and all banks, bankers, trust companies, savings banks, savings and loan associations, investment companies, and other persons carrying on a banking business, or insurance companies, insurance associations, and other persons carrying on an insurance business, and all administrators, executors, guardians, trustees, and other fiduciaries, and all other persons whatsoever, who now or may hereafter be authorized to invest in bonds or other obligations of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania or of the State of New Jersey, may properly and legally invest funds, including capital belonging to them or within their control; and said bonds or other obligations are hereby made securities which may properly and legally be deposited with and received by any State or municipal officer or agency of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey for any purpose for which the deposit of bonds or other obligations, either of the Commonwealth or of the State, is now or may hereafter be authorized.

ARTICLE VIII

The effectuation of its authorized purposes by the commission is and will be in all respects for the benefit of the people of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey, and for the increase of their commerce and prosperity, and since the commission will be performing essential governmental functions in effectuating said purposes, the commission shall not be required to pay any taxes or assessments upon any property acquired or used by it for purposes authorized by this agreement; and the bonds or obligations issued by the commission, their transfer, and the income therefrom, including any profits made on the sale thereof, shall, at all times, be free from taxation within the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey.

ARTICLE IX

The commission shall make annual reports to the Governors and legislatures of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey, setting forth in detail its operations and transactions, and may make such additional reports, from time to time, to the Governors and legislatures as it may deem advisable.

Whenever the commission, after investigation and study, shall have concluded plans, with estimates of cost, and means of financing any new toll bridge across the Delaware River, as hereinbefore provided, it shall make to the legislatures of each State, at the next sessions thereof, a detailed report, dealing with the contemplated project; but such project may, nevertheless, be proceeded with if the legislatures of said States, or either of them, are not in session.

ARTICLE X

Whenever particular bonds issued for any bridge or bridges, and the interest thereon, shall have been paid, or a sufficient amount shall have been provided for their payment and shall continue to be held for that purpose, the commission shall cease to charge tolls for the use of such bridge and thereafter such bridge shall be a free bridge, and shall thereafter be maintained equally at the cost of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey by appropriations made for such purposes, as now provided by law for the maintenance of bridges over the Delaware River acquired by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey.

In witness whereof, this 18th day of December 1934, A. Harry Moore has affixed his signature hereto as Governor of the State of New Jersey and caused the great seal of the State to be attached thereto.

[SEAL] A. HARRY MOORE,
Governor, State of New Jersey.

And, on this 19th day of December 1934, Gifford Pinchot has affixed his signature hereto as Governor of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and caused the great seal of the Commonwealth to be attached thereto.

[SEAL] GIFFORD PINCHOT,
Governor, Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby given to the aforesaid compact or agreement, and to each and every term and provision thereof: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect, impair, or diminish any right, power, or jurisdiction of the United States or of any court, department, board, bureau, officer, or official of the United States, over or in regard to any navigable waters, or any commerce between the States or with foreign countries, or any bridge, railroad, highway, pier, wharf, or other facility or improvement, or any other person, matter, or thing, forming the subject matter of the aforesaid compact or agreement or otherwise affected by the terms thereof: And provided further, That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this resolution, or any part thereof, is hereby expressly reserved.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT OF STEAMBOAT INSPECTION ACT

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 2001, to amend section 4426 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by the act of Congress approved May 16, 1906.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand that my colleague the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] desires that this bill go over without prejudice.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 7814, to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to grant to the State of California an easement over certain land of the United States in Tehama County, Calif., for highway purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce is hereby authorized to grant to the State of California an easement over a 20-foot strip of land situated along the easterly boundary of the Mill Creek (Calif.) Fisheries Station property in Tehama County in said State, for State highway purposes; said strip of land, which consists of twenty-four one-hundredths acre, more or less, to be particularly described in said grant.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BOARD OF REGENTS, SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION

The Clerk called the next resolution, S. J. Res. 118, providing for the filling of a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill already is the law, having been passed at the last session.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate joint resolution be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION OF SUWANNEE RIVER, FLA.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8300, to authorize a preliminary examination of Suwannee River in the State of Florida, from Florida-Georgia State line to the Gulf of Mexico.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I questioned the necessity of a similar bill a minute ago on the ground that the authority already exists.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OF BANKRUPTCY ACT

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6982, to amend section 80 of chapter 9 of an act to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it seems to me that this is a rather important bill to be called up on the Consent Calendar.

Mr. Speaker, for the moment I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. MILLER. Temporarily?

Mr. TABER. Until the next call of the Consent Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

TO ENCOURAGE TRAVEL TO AND WITHIN THE UNITED STATES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5844, to encourage travel to and within the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish the author of the bill would make a short explanation, would tell us how much it will cost the Government annually.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Speaker, the first year the cost of administration under the bill will not exceed $75,000, and in succeeding years the cost cannot be greater than $125,000 annually.

The purpose of this bill is to promote travel to and within the United States and also, so far as possible, on American ships.

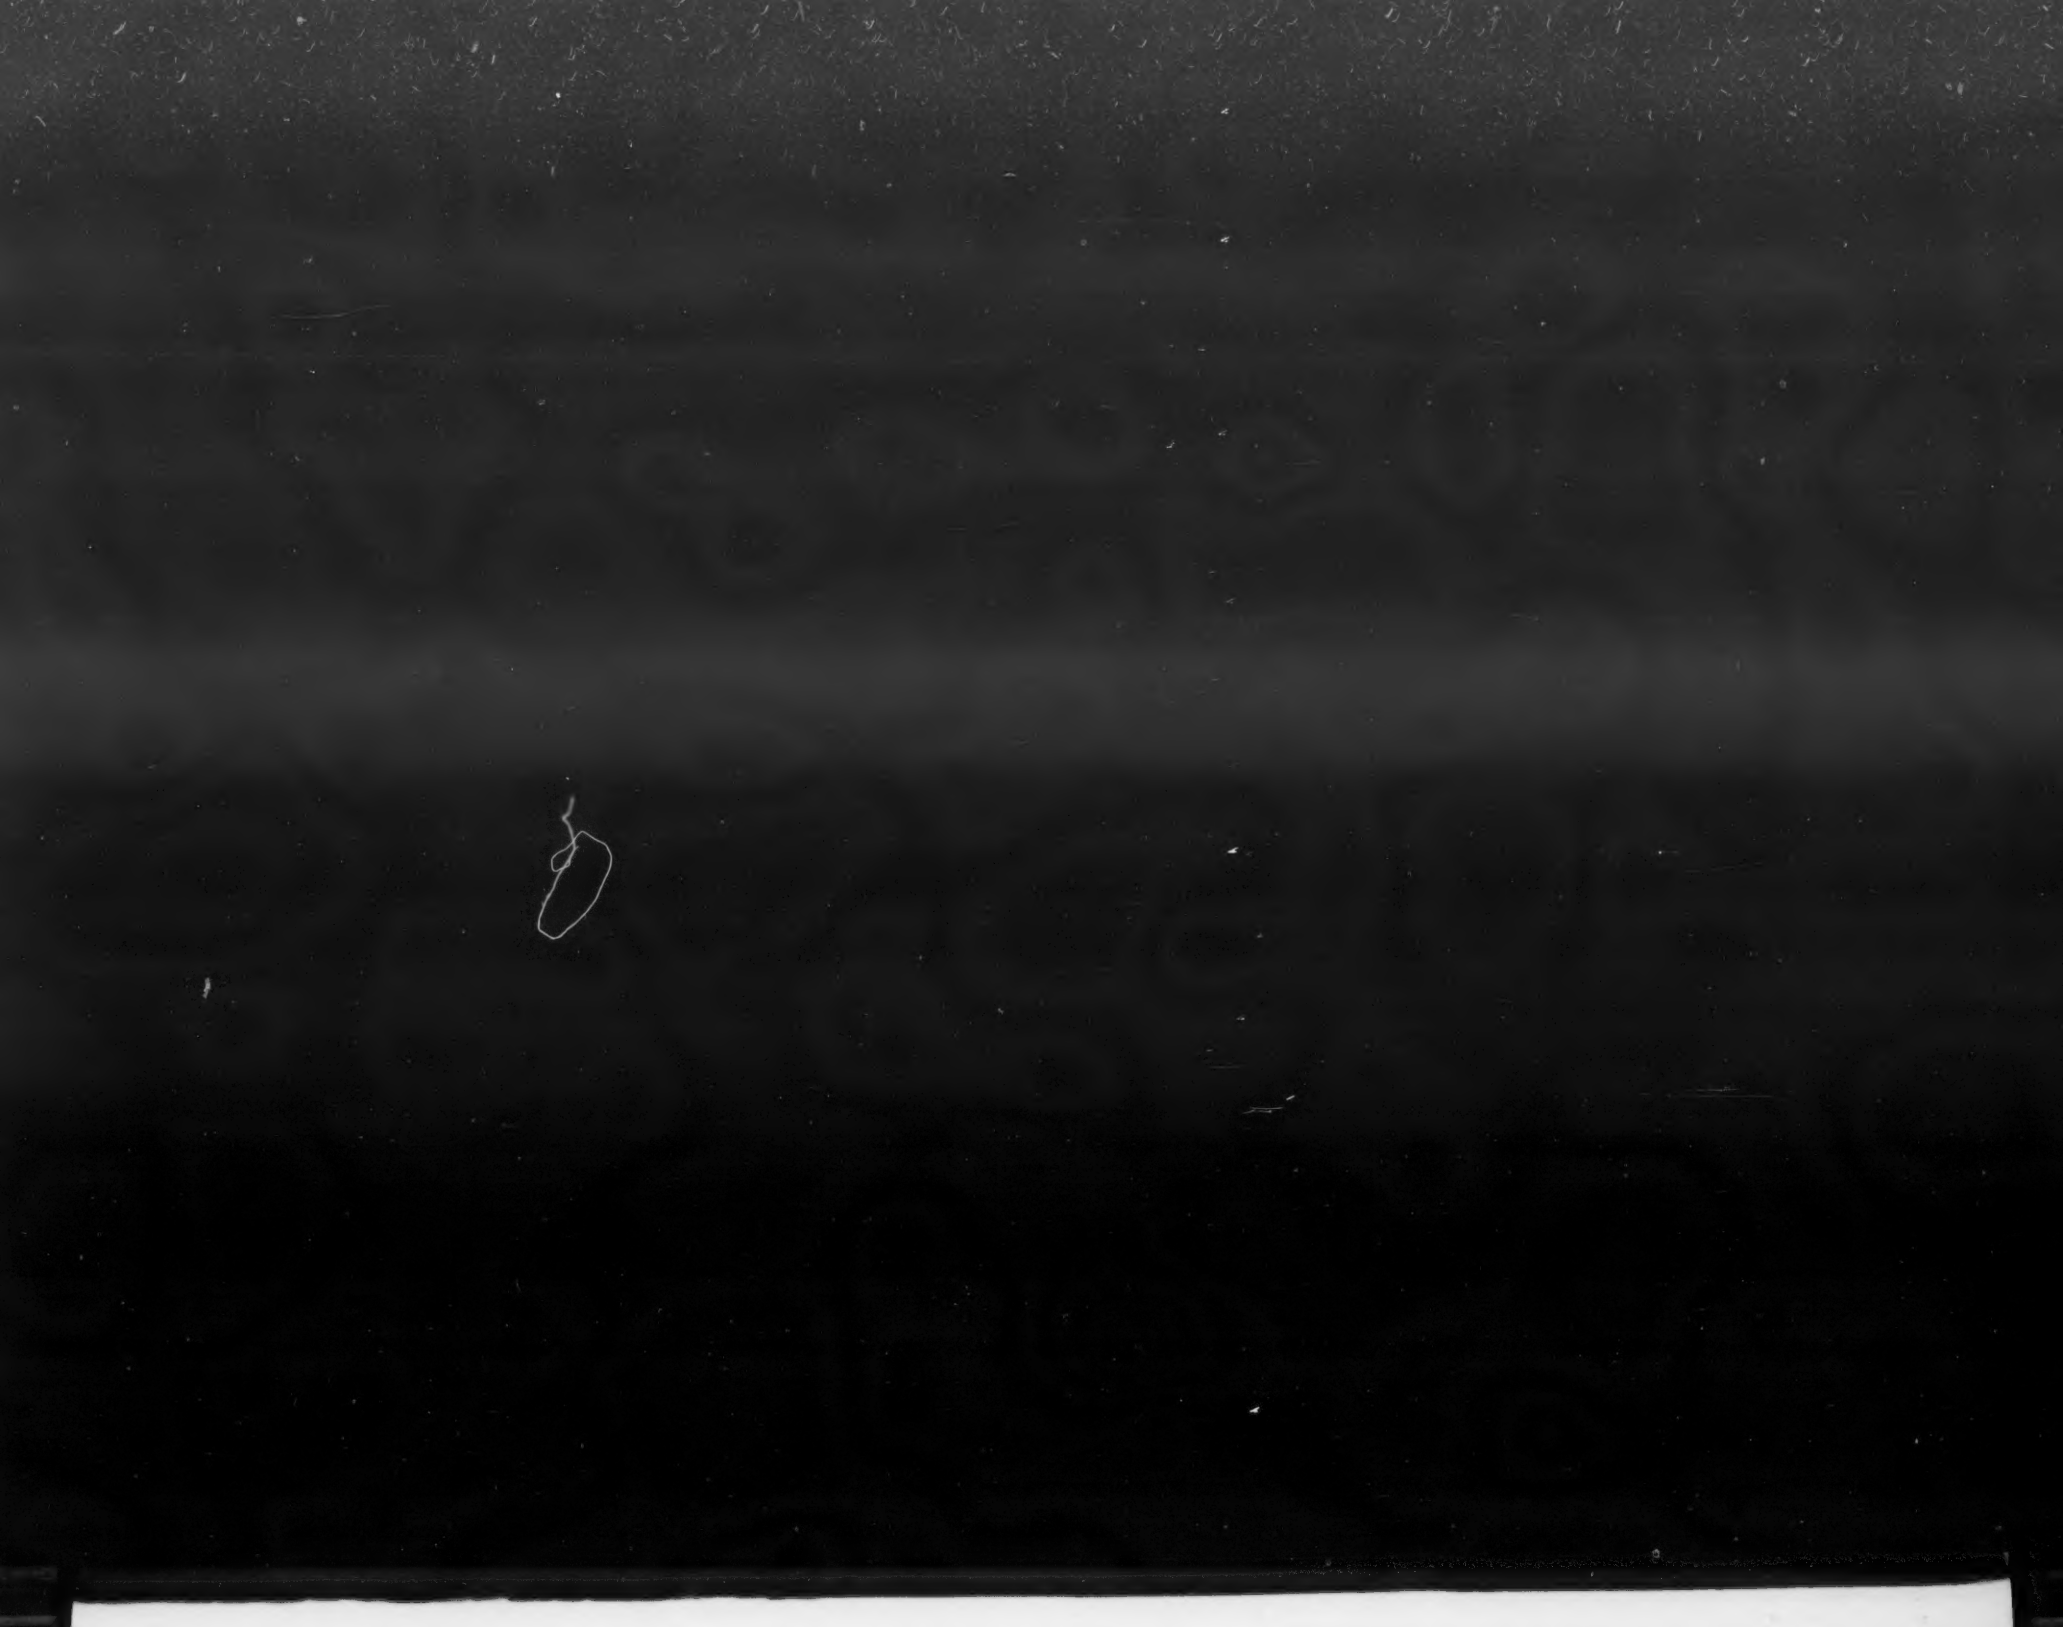
Practically every foreign country engages in this sort of activity. The United States has a balance of trade against her on tourist travel ranging from $200,000,000 to $600,000,000 a year. This bill is an attempt in a modest way to try and create a more favorable balance for our own country.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I have no doubt that some encouragement should be given to the travel in and to the United States, but I do not think that the people in Europe particularly have enough money to come over here. If they do have enough money, they ought to use it to pay their debts to us before doing any traveling. A lot of people from foreign countries come to this country annually. We have no way of checking the aliens coming into this country. Sometimes they stay far beyond their agreed-upon time and beyond the time that the permit allows them to stay in this country, during which time many of them engage in competition with Americans in industry and business. In my own State there have been some people who came in on visitors' permits and they have stayed for long periods without becoming citizens. They have taken jobs that Americans could otherwise have held and still have failed to apply for citizenship. I would favor this bill if the Immigration Committee of the House would devise some way to register the aliens and travelers who enter this country, just like Americans are compelled to register when visiting Europe. I doubt very much whether we will make very much money from the people who may come here from Europe as today the only ones who come in are broke and looking for a job or someone to support them.

Mr. LEA of California. That is only a part of the purpose of the bill. Through the United States Consular Service and the commercial attachés of the Commerce Department we have 348 offices in foreign countries at the present time. This bill is designed to utilize these existing agencies to promote travel as well as trade in favor of the United States, to use these existing agencies rather than to build up a set of new agencies.

It is already against the law for anyone visiting this country to stay longer than the limit fixed by his visitor's permit. Such visitors are denied the right to engage in all ordinary employments and are subject to deportation and penalties if they do.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Is this a sort of subsidizing measure?



Mr. LEA of California. No; not at all.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I would suggest that the Members of the House are entitled to a full understanding as to how much this bureau is going to cost. The purported cost as set out in this bill is $125,000 for this year, but next year it may cost $150,000.

Mr. LEA of California. There is a specific provision in the bill which prohibits an increased cost, section 6.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Does that provision prohibit an increase for next year?

Mr. LEA of California. Section 6 prohibits an increase for all time. That section provides that appropriations for carrying out the purposes of the act shall not exceed $75,000 for the first year and shall "not exceed $125,000 for any fiscal year thereafter."

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I object.

SUSPENSION OF NONQUOTA IMMIGRATION VISAS TO PERSONS BORN IN MEXICO

The Clerk called the next joint resolution, H. J. Res. 236, to suspend issuance of nonquota immigration visas to persons born in the Republic of Mexico, to suspend issuance of all nonpreference quota immigration visas, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mrs. O'DAY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

DEPORTATION OF CERTAIN ALIEN SEAMEN

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5380, to provide for the deportation of certain alien seamen, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mrs. O'DAY and Mrs. KAHN objected.

CONVEYANCE OF CERTAIN LAND TO THE CITY OF ENFIELD, CONN.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8559, to convey certain land to the city of Enfield, Conn.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to convey to the board of selectmen of the town of Enfield of the State of Connecticut, for street purposes only, all the right, title, and interest of the United States to the following described parcel of land which forms a part of the new post-office site at Enfield, Conn.:

Lying and being in the town of Enfield, county of Hartford, State of Connecticut, being a strip of land fronting 32 feet on the northerly side of High Street and extending of that width in a northwardly direction along the westerly side of Bartley Avenue for the full depth of the post-office site, a distance of 150 feet: Provided, however, That the said town of Enfield, Conn., shall not have the right to sell or convey the said described premises nor to devote the same to any other purpose than as hereinbefore provided; and in the event said premises shall not be used for street purposes only and cared for and maintained as are other public streets in said town, the right, title, and interest conveyed to the town of Enfield shall revert to the United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

EXPENSES OF RAILROAD RETIREMENT BOARD

The Clerk called the next resolution, S. J. Res. 144, to provide for the payment of compensation and expenses of the Railroad Retirement Board as established and operated pursuant to section 9 of the Railroad Retirement Act of June 27, 1934, and to provide for the winding up of its affairs and the disposition of its property and records, and to make an appropriation for such purposes.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

Whereas the Railroad Retirement Board was established and organized as an independent agency in the executive branch of the Government by and pursuant to section 9 of the Railroad Retirement Act, which act has been held by the Supreme Court of the United States to be invalid; and

Whereas the Railroad Retirement Board in the performance of its duties has acquired valuable data, records, information, and experience which should be utilized in determining the policy of Congress regarding the subjects of employment by railroads and the retirement of employees of railroads; and

Whereas the Board has records of individual employments which are of great value and should be preserved, and has in the course of its work received valuable records and documents which must be returned to their owners after the information contained therein shall have been noted and photostatic copies, where necessary, shall have been made: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the Railroad Retirement Board as established in section 9 of the Railroad Retirement Act (Public, No. 485, 73d Cong.) and the appointment and compensation of its members and the employment and compensation of its staff are hereby approved, ratified, and confirmed to all intents and purposes as if the provisions of section 9 relating thereto had on the day of their enactment been enacted as a statute distinct and separate from any other provisions of the Railroad Retirement Act aforesaid; and no member of the Board or of its staff shall be liable for any action heretofore taken within the terms of the authority sought to be granted by the Railroad Retirement Act.

SEC. 2. The Railroad Retirement Board as established by and pursuant to section 9 of the Railroad Retirement Act and section 1 hereof is hereby continued for a period of 60 days from the enactment hereof for the purpose of liquidating its affairs; returning documents in its possession to those from whom they were procured and whose property they are, after recording therefrom such information as in its judgment should be preserved or making photostatic copies thereof, where necessary; arranging for turning over the records, papers, and property of the Board to such agency as the President shall designate; and making a report upon its activities and experience to the President for transmission to Congress.

SEC. 3. The Board shall maintain such offices, use such equipment, furnishings, supplies, services, and facilities, and employ such persons as in its judgment may be necessary for the proper discharge of its duties.

SEC. 4. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $35,000 to pay to the Board and its employees for services heretofore rendered on, prior to, and subsequent to May 6, 1935, and for services to be rendered during the next 60 days after the enactment hereof, the compensation to which they would have been entitled for such services if the Railroad Retirement Act had been held constitutional, and to pay any expenses heretofore incurred and not yet paid and the expenses necessary in carrying out this joint resolution.

SEC. 5. The Board is hereby authorized and directed to refund to its past and present employees and to its members all compensation earned by them but withheld as employee contributions to the railroad-retirement fund and deposited to the credit of said fund in the Treasury, and said fund is hereby appropriated and made available for such refundments accordingly.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

ANNUITY LEGISLATION COVERING INTERSTATE CARRIERS BY RAILROAD

The Clerk called the next resolution, H. J. Res. 314, to provide for a commission to investigate the desirability of further retirement and annuity legislation applicable to interstate carriers by railroad.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe this resolution is now necessary; therefore, I now ask unanimous consent that the resolution be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT TO COMMUNICATIONS ACT OF 1934

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1336, to amend paragraph (f) of section 4 of the Communications Act of 1934.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph (f) of section 4 of the Communications Act, 1934, is hereby amended by adding after the words "a chief engineer and not more than three assistants", the words "a chief accountant and not more than three assistants", and by adding after the words "and the chief engineer", the words "and the chief accountant", and by adding after the word "engineers" the word "accountants", so that paragraph (f) of section 4, as amended, will read as follows:

"(f) Without regard to the civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, (1) the Commission may appoint and prescribe the duties and fix the salaries of a secretary, a director for each division, a chief engineer and not more than three assistants, a chief accountant and not more than three assistants, a general counsel and not more than three assistants, and temporary counsel designated by the Commission for the performance of special services; and (2) each commissioner may appoint and prescribe the duties of a secretary at an annual salary not to exceed $4,000. The general counsel and the chief engineer and the chief accountant shall each receive an annual salary of not to exceed $9,000; the secretary shall receive an annual salary of not to exceed $7,500; the director of each division shall receive an annual salary of not to exceed $7,500; and no assistant shall receive an annual salary in excess of $7,500. The Commission shall have authority, subject to the provisions of the civil-service laws and the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, to appoint such other officers, engineers, accountants, inspectors, attorneys, examiners, and other employees as are necessary in the execution of its functions."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

WESTERN BANDS OF SHOSHONE INDIANS

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 2510, authorizing the western bands of the Shoshone Tribe of Indians to sue in the Court of Claims.

Mr. HOPE. I object, Mr. Speaker.

AMENDMENT OF BANKRUPTCY ACT

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 377, the bill (H. R. 6982), to amend section 80 of chapter 9 of an act to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and I shall ask for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 80 of chapter 9 of an act to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 80. Municipal debt readjustments: (a) Any municipality or other political subdivision of any State, including (but not hereby limiting the generality of the foregoing) any county, city, borough, village, parish, town, or township, unincorporated tax of special assessment district, and any school, drainage, irrigation, reclamation, levee, sewer, or paving, sanitary, port, improvement, or other districts (hereinafter referred to as a 'taxing district'), may file a petition stating that the taxing district is insolvent or unable to meet its debts as they mature, and that it desires to effect a plan of readjustment of its debts. The petition shall be filed with the court in whose territorial jurisdiction the taxing district or the major part thereof is located and for any such district having no officials of its own the petition shall be filed by the municipality or political subdivision, the officials of which have power to contract on behalf of said district or to levy the special assessments within such district. The petition shall be accompanied by payment to the clerk of a filing fee of $100, which shall be in addition to the fees required to be collected by the clerk under other chapters of this act. The petition shall state that a plan of readjustment has been prepared, is filed and submitted with the petition, and that creditors of the taxing district owning not less than 30 percent in the case of drainage, irrigation, reclamation, and levee districts (except as hereinafter provided), and owning not less than 51 percent in the case of all other taxing districts in amount of the bonds, notes, and certificates of indebtedness of the taxing district affected by the plan, excluding bonds, notes, or certificates of indebtedness owned, held, or controlled by the taxing district in a fund or otherwise, have accepted it in writing. The petition shall be accompanied with such written acceptance and with a list of all known creditors of the taxing district, together with their addresses so far as known to the taxing district, and description of their respective claims showing separately those who have accepted the plan of readjustment, together with their separate addresses, the contents of which list shall not constitute admissions by the taxing districts in a proceeding under this chapter or otherwise. Upon the filing of such a petition the judge shall enter an order either approving it as properly filed under this chapter, if satisfied that such petition complies with this chapter and has been filed in good faith, or dismissing it, if not so satisfied. If creditors holding 5 percent in amount of the bonds, notes, or certificates of indebtedness shall within 90 days after the first publication of the notice provided for in subdivision (c), clause (1), of this chapter, appear and controvert the facts alleged in the petition, the judge shall decide the issues presented, and unless the material allegations of the petition are sustained shall dismiss the petition: Provided, however, That such written acceptance of not less than 30 percent of the creditors of drainage, irrigation, reclamation, and levee districts shall not be required in any case where a loan shall have been authorized to the petitioning taxing district by an agency of the United States Government for the purpose of enabling any such petitioning district to reduce and refinance its outstanding indebtedness.

"(b) The plan of readjustment shall not be confirmed until it has been accepted in writing, filed in the proceeding, by or on behalf of creditors whose claims have been allowed holding two-thirds in amount of the claims of each class whose claims have been allowed and would be affected by the plan (except as hereinafter provided), and by creditors holding 66⅔ percent in the case of drainage, irrigation, reclamation, and levee districts and creditors holding 75 percent in the case of all other taxing districts in amount of the claims of all classes of the taxing district affected by the plan, but excluding claims owned, held, or controlled by a taxing district, and such plan has been accepted and approved by the taxing district in a writing filed in the proceeding, signed in its name by an authorized authority: Provided, however, That it shall not be requisite to the confirmation of the plan that there be such acceptance by any creditor or class of creditors (a) whose claims are not affected by the plan, or (b) if the plan makes provision for the payment of their claims in cash in full, or (c) if provision is made in the plan for the protection of the interests, claims, or liens of such creditors or class of creditors, or (d) of a petitioning taxing district to which a loan shall have been authorized by an agency of the United States Government, for the purpose of enabling the petitioning district to reduce and refinance its outstanding indebtedness."

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 3, after the word "that", insert "subparagraphs '(a)' and '(d)' of."

Page 1, line 7, strike out "is" and insert in lieu thereof "are."

Page 4, beginning with line 8 strike out the remainder of the bill and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(d) The plan of readjustment shall not be confirmed until it has been accepted in writing, filed in the proceeding, by or on behalf of creditors holding at least 51 percent in amount of the claims of each class in the case of drainage, irrigation, reclamation, and levee districts and creditors holding two-thirds in amount of the claims of each class in the case of all other taxing districts whose claims have been allowed and would be affected by the plan, and by creditors holding 51 percent in the case of drainage, irrigation, reclamation, and levee districts and creditors holding 75 percent in the case of all other taxing districts in amount of the claims of all classes of the taxing district affected by the plan, but excluding claims owned, held, or controlled by a taxing district, and such plan has been accepted and approved by the taxing district in a writing filed in the proceeding, signed in its name by an authorized authority: Provided, however, That it shall not be requisite to the confirmation of the plan that there be such acceptance by any creditor or class of creditors (a) whose claims are not affected by the plan, or (b) if the plan makes provision for the payment of their claims in cash in full, or (c) if provision is made in the plan for the protection of the interests, claims, or liens of such creditors or class of creditors."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I understand this is about as far as it is possible to go on the calendar today because of conditions that exist on both sides, and I suggest that we suspend the call of the calendar at this point.

I do this, Mr. Speaker, because I understand that possibly some of the official objectors on the minority side are not prepared to go further with the calendar today on account of the short notice they have had of its calling.

NATIONAL DEFENSE AND NEUTRALITY LEGISLATION

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address delivered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK], Saturday, December 28, 1935:

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, we cannot escape the thought—nor should we—that the world is again faced with the probability of another war, the happening of which will bring greater destructiveness than that which occurred during the World War. We must face the facts honestly and fearlessly, with a determination to do all that we can to avert such a happening; and if unable to, to take that course which is for the best interests of our country. It is not my purpose to discuss in detail the destructiveness of war, nor to predict the disastrous effects to civilization of another world disaster. However, wars of the future will be conducted between peoples, not alone armies and navies, and every man, woman, and child, without regard to age or physical condition, will be involved therein. High-sounding words will be uttered about noncombatants being protected, but the war of the future will show no regard for them. Every effort will be made to win a quick decision—cities will be attacked; the machinery of warfare has so changed that the wars of the future will involve peoples, and not particularly armies or navies. No one can picture the result without a profound realization of the necessity of doing everything that can possibly and properly be done to avert such a possibility. Only within a few days His Holiness Pope Pius, the spiritual leader of many millions of persons of all races and nationalities, gave expression to his fears. Coming at this time of the year, this is very significant. With the opportunities that His Holiness has for obtaining reliable information that diplomats ordinarily keep secret, his utterances cannot be ignored. It is the best evidence of a dangerous situation confronting the world.

At the same time His Holiness expressed hope—and while his expression of fear is powerful evidence of the danger—his expression of hope is also equally powerful evidence that the dark clouds of war may pass by. Let us hope so. His appeal was to world-wide public opinion to wake up to the dangers and to express and assert itself in favor of peace. Public opinion, if capable of expression, is the most powerful weapon that exists in influencing the judgment and actions of rulers or leaders of a nation. There is no question as to the world-wide aversion to war. There is a question of this opinion being crystallized into action capable of producing the desired results—peace. The feeling against war is so repulsive that no nation wants to be placed in the position of being the aggressor. However, causes of war exist on all sides. Every factor that has led to past wars is existent today. What can be done to prevent those conditions from being consummated? An aroused public opinion is the best weapon to use. The appeal of His Holiness Pope Pius is an attempt to crystallize this existing opinion into a world-wide movement. If such existing opinion was capable of crystallization, I would have no fear of war. However, we cannot overlook the fact that it is only in a democracy that public opinion can be expressed and crystallized into immediate action.

If war in Europe comes again, the question that confronts us is, What should be the position of the United States? What should be our policies with reference to the warring nations and to our own people?

It must be borne in mind that we are living in a very practical world. Almost 2,000 years have gone by since Christ came to this world to redeem mankind, with his message of love and charity. If all mankind accepted his message of love, charity, and "peace on earth to men of good will", misunderstandings would be capable of easy adjustment. However, causes of strife among individuals and nations still exist, creating a condition which calls for action along many lines based on expediency and necessity, rather than on principle, which most of us would like to see exist. The law of self-preservation applies to nations just the same as to individuals. It is the duty of our Government to take such action and to adopt such policies as will assure to our people, in case of attack and war, a continuance of our institutions of government and protection of our shores and of our people. That calls for an Army and a Navy capable of protection in the event of attack; for an Army and a Navy that will command the respect of other nations.

While America stands for peace today—as it always has in the past—we must be assured of means of protection in the event that the selfishness of other nations is directed toward the United States. While some who advocate pacifism are sincere, I cannot agree with their premises that with an armed world the United States should scrap her Navy and reduce her already small Army, as a lesson to other nations of the course that they should take. If that situation should ever arise—and it will not—we would leave ourselves defenseless in an armed world and we would invite a war directed toward ourselves.

Our Navy should be built up to the strength allowed by existing treaties. Steps have already been taken in that direction during the past 2 years. They must be continued. Our Army should be built up to the strength intended by the National Defense Act of 1920. Steps have also been taken in this direction during the past 2 years. They should be continued. The world conditions existing at the present time, which are the basis for congressional consideration as to the size of our Army and Navy call for the building of our Navy to our treaty strength and the increasing of our Army to the strength, at least, allowed by the National Defense Act of 1920. Public opinion should demand of Congress such action.

President Roosevelt has ably performed his duty in this respect. Our people should continue to support him in his efforts. Such a policy is not an act of war—it is an act of peace.

In the event of war in Europe we will be presented with the question of neutrality, in order to remain outside of its sphere, and to do what we should do—mind our own business. The experience of the World War has taught us that we do not want to become involved in another European affair. Our education of that period has convinced practically all Americans that the warnings of Washington "to mind our own business" and "keep out of entangling alliances with foreign nations" still apply and are the best policy for us to follow.

The happenings of the past 2 years are the best evidence that we followed the right course in not becoming a member of the League of Nations. The United States should be, and is, a good neighbor; but we can and should conduct ourselves as a good neighbor in a manner in which we can mind our own business—refrain from taking any action which is likely to involve us in any conflict—to follow such policies, national and international, as will assure independence of American action, such as we consistently followed prior to the World War. A position of neutrality must have a regard for international law. In accordance with international law, we have passed, and can pass, legislation placing an embargo on the sale of munitions and implements or war to warring nations. Such legislation is recognized by all nations as the right of any particular nation.

When we go outside of munitions and implements of war, caution must be employed and international law must be respected. There is a difference between munitions and implements of war and commodities which can be used for war or for peace purposes. Again we are confronted with a condition and not a theory. The present neutrality legislation expires in February 1936. One of the first acts of the Congress will be the passage of additional legislation. We must conduct ourselves in such a manner that no misunderstanding in this respect will exist in the minds of the peoples of other nations. We must act independently, and not in concert with the League of Nations, or with any other nations. We must adopt a course that will not permit of the feeling of discrimination against some nations and preference for others. Hostile acts, or acts which under existing international law will permit of such a construction by some nations, must be avoided if we are to keep out of war if one develops.

Every course consistent with the strong opinion of America—peace, not war—should be adopted and followed. At the present time every proper effort to avert war should be made; but in the event of war, without regard to what nations are involved therein, the United States should follow a course that will keep us out of war and not to be drawn in against our will. It is my opinion that Congress should state specifically the provisions of neutrality legislation, and that the delegation of broad powers would be unwise. The responsibility lies with the Congress. It should assume that duty. It should not pass the responsibility to the executive department.

Neutrality legislation must be carefully framed so that other nations will not feel that it is aimed adversely at them and favorably to other nations. It must be strictly American—fair and honest to all nations, expressing a clear position on our part that is not capable of misunderstanding—and that in the light of world conditions, determine the course for the United States to take to avert being drawn into any conflict.

While it probably will not happen, it seems to me that the best course for Congress to pursue, in absence of actual war, would be to provide for an immediate embargo on munitions and implements of war, and to leave other questions open for further consideration in the event of war occurring. That would leave us in a clear position, where no nation could feel that legislation was particularly directed at them. Sometime efforts of this kind, unless well thought out, are an exciting cause, creating embarrassing international conditions. In any event, the Congress should assume its responsibility in determining our neutrality legislation.

Our country is composed of people of all races, of all creeds, and of all nationalities. Naturally, every one of us has a love for the land of his birth, if abroad, or the land of the birth of his forebears. However, our first love is for the United States. In any crisis that may come—which we all hope and pray will be averted—all of us should keep in mind that our first duty is to our country. On the other hand, the Congress, in drafting neutrality legislation, must also keep in mind the duty of passing an act which has the best interests of the United States in mind, that will not involve us in a foreign conflict, and is not capable of attack or criticism on account of discrimination of or preference to some nations.

There is one more thought that I want to express. Prior to the World War some nations spent millions of dollars in the United States for propaganda purposes to influence the mind of our people. That is improper. It should not happen again. I have written to Secretary Hull, calling his attention to the fact that this effort might be made again and that the State Department should watch the same; and at the first sign of organized propaganda in which a foreign nation is directly or indirectly involved, stern and immediate action should be taken. The power of propaganda in forming public opinion cannot be underestimated. For a foreign nation to adopt such a course is an act of hostility and a violation of international law. It should not be permitted.

I conclude, my friends, by wishing each and every listener a happy new year, with the hope and prayer that the coming year will bring to troubled mankind peace and happiness, not war and misery.

R. S. V. P. DR. TOWNSEND

Mr. MAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including some remarks made by myself in a radio address delivered in Chicago on December 28 last.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address delivered by me from Chicago over the Columbia Broadcasting System, December 28, 1935, as follows:

Not many years ago a tall, lean young man with a pleasant smile and a determined jaw confided in some of his friends that he intended to make a solo flight across the Atlantic and land on Le Bourget at Paris. Some of those who heard of these plans shook their heads, shrugged their shoulders, and dubbed the whole idea of flying alone across the Atlantic in a heavier-than-air machine as fantastic, absurd, and impossible.

There was considerable pity and not a little open skepticism. There were even those who dared give voice, although perhaps not a very loud voice, to a belief that there was little intent on the part of this youth to fly to Paris, but that eventually he would give up, having made a gesture which had brought him wide attention. But shortly after the expression of those dire predictions and gloomy forebodings the name of Charles A. Lindbergh flashed around the world, and the world still marvels at the daring and simplicity of that young man's program.

"Darius Green and his flying machine" were the stock in trade of antiair skeptics for years. Colonel Lindbergh was captured by the magnificent obsession. But that which was regarded by many as fantastic, absurd, and impossible became the glorious reality for the inspiration and blessing of an admiring world.

Over in the Third Congressional District of Michigan we have just come through a special election to fill the unexpired term of the Honorable Henry M. Kimball, of Kalamazoo, who died in the midst of his first term as our Representative in Congress. During the 7 weeks' campaigning for the primary, held on November 19, and the special election, held on December 17, we heard those same words that I have referred to above—namely, fantastic crackbrained, absurd, and impossible—owing to the fact that early in the preprimary campaign I espoused the Townsend plan as one of the planks of my platform.

And at this particular time, in view of the auspices under which I am speaking, it will be only natural and proper for me to confine myself to the discussion of that particular plank. There were four other candidates for the Republican nomination, all of whom were capable men. None of the others adopted the Townsend plank. One of my opponents was particularly violent in his opposition to me and the Townsend plan. When the votes at the primary were counted he was fourth down on the list. I received a clear majority over the combined votes of my four opponents.

Following the primary my Democratic opponent chose to direct his campaign almost entirely against the Townsend plank in my platform. His publicity was high-powered and high-priced. We didn't spend much money, but we had a wonderful group of good speakers in the district promoting the Townsend clubs during the campaign. Dr. Townsend spoke at two mass meetings before the primary, and Mr. Clements addressed four meetings just prior to the election. The election resulted in a better than 2-to-1 majority for the Townsend-backed Republican candidate. I carried 191 out of 196 precincts; I carried every one of the five counties in the district. The margin of victory prevailed in the cities as well as in the rural sections.

Dr. Townsend would like to get your reaction to this broadcast. "R. S. V. P.", "respondez sil vous plais"; address Townsend headquarters, Washington, D. C. And now, in spite of a badly overworked alphabet, may I continue further use of the prevailing fad of the day and adopt an alphabetical arrangement to suggest the theme and the thesis of my address. In fact, I find that this familiar abbreviation just mentioned suggests some thoughts and their relative order of importance as they stand out in the Townsend plan. But in this connection, please forget the French, and just remember the letters "R. S. V. P." They stand for recovery, stabilization, vision, and pension.

In my opinion, a great part of the difficulty, opposition, and ridicule which has attended the campaign for the Townsend plan has arisen out of the fact that too much attention has been centered on the word "pension", whereas the fundamental and primary emphasis should have been placed on the thought of "recovery." Therefore, I am suggesting that we use these letters, "R. S. V. P.", as the keynote of this speech, and that the emphasis and importance of these symbols is in the following order: Recovery, stabilization, vision, and pension.

Therefore, may I now discuss the first three of these suggestions and ask you to banish the word "pension" from your mind for the next 10 minutes? Let us consider the thought of recovery and economic stabilization. Vice President Tom Marshall once said that what the country needed was a good 5-cent cigar. I submit that what this country needs is economic stability on a high level of production and consumption. Let us get back the level of gross dollar value of turn-over in business attained in 1928 and 1929 and wipe out the peaks and valleys of industrial fluctuation that have wrought such devastation among the once proud owners of farms and factories. Ninety percent of our businessmen will agree that restoration of real prosperity is contingent upon general and widely distributed purchasing power. What the country needs is consumers who are ready, willing, and able to purchase the goods on the merchants' shelves and to buy the products of our farms and factories.

Productive employment in private industry should be the real objective of the great mass of able-bodied citizens. But when we are confronted with the fact that literally millions of our young people who have recently graduated from high schools and colleges have never had the opportunity to engage in remunerative employment in private industry we are face to face with a solemn, significant, and serious disorder in our social system. The imperative need for additional employment in private industry for our millions of able-bodied citizens in their forties and fifties who are refused employment in our factories because of their age is a fact and not a theory. And this stark, gripping fact must challenge the earnest consideration of every citizen, rich or poor, of high or low estate, who has the welfare and security of his Nation at heart. This Nation cannot endure with millions of our young people in the late teens and early twenties unemployed and with other millions of our able-bodied sober men and women in their forties and fifties unable to secure work in our factories or in lines of service employment. Now, it seems to me that there is an obvious answer to this problem. It has been repeatedly said that this country is not suffering from overproduction but rather from underconsumption.

Capitalism has been guilty of many mistakes, but, notwithstanding the abuses and errors which have been allowed to develop under the capitalistic system, nevertheless, the benefits, blessings, and achievements of that system of society excel the objectives and accomplishments of any other order of society. American individualists are capitalists at heart. We are individualistic in our home-loving instincts. We are individualistic in our approach to the problems of religion and in our personal relations to the Creator. We are individualistic in our attitude toward the ownership of property, the obligations of personal industry, the incentive to thrift, and the sanctity of family ties.

We highly esteem traditional American individualism and its rugged search for security in old age. But we have had a depression which attained the dimensions of a national disaster. Investments in farms, homes, savings banks, life insurance, bank stock, and railroad bonds have been wiped out. Millions of our people are without property or prospect of income. The embarrassing alternatives of public relief, the poorhouse or chloroform, stare many of our people in the face.

Freedom and equality have been watchwords in the evolution of America. But there is no freedom when large groups of our people are in the clutches of economic serfdom. Equality is only an abstract political platitude. There is no such thing as absolute equality of talent or capacity. But there is one universal yardstick to determine equality, and that is on the basis of the number of years lived. By the very process of living, eating food, and wearing shoes our senior American citizens have contributed to the general wealth of society. And at the same time the increasingly progressive steps in technological processes have constantly increased the volume and value of our products. But the number of employed is constantly decreasing. Our older citizens do not have the ghost of a chance of securing employment. But technological improvement has made it possible for us to produce enough for everyone to have an abundance, provided we have general and widespread purchasing power.

At the outset the Townsend plan is a pump-priming process. Those of you who have had experience with the old-fashioned wooden pump over the old-fashioned dug well will recall that when the pump ran down you had no success in priming it, if you attempted to use a tablespoonful of water for the purpose. Usually you had no success if you used only a tin cup full of water; the chances are that a gallon pail was insufficient; but a 2-gallon pail of water, accompanied by vigorous application of elbow grease to the pump handle, brought results. Though there appeared to be some water wasted in the priming process, that which appeared to be wasted ran back into the well and was again available for the pumping process.

This country has been suffering from a downward spiral in the business cycle for the past 6 years. The Townsend plan would provide the stimulus and the means to start the upward spiral in the business cycle. It has been said that anyone who is asked to define a spiral staircase does it invariably by using his hands by way of demonstration. The desired upward spiral in the business cycle of the Nation can be started only by using our heads to lead the way in the direction the heart inclines. We are living in a land and age of plenty. We are no longer confronted with the problems of an economy of scarcity. Today we have an economy of plenty. Technological improvements in our mechanical development are such that our farms and factories can provide an abundance for all. The new agricultural implement known as a combine has revolutionized the production of wheat. And the new mechanical cotton picker is said to be capable of doing work equivalent to that of a hundred human cotton pickers.

The Brookings Institution says that there is a shortage of sixteen to nineteen billion dollars per year between our present consumption and our potential production. The Townsend plan fills that gap, as it proposes to force into circulation $19,000,000,000 yearly for the prompt purchase of commodities and services requiring the employment of the younger men and women.

We need no foreign market. We have sufficient purchasing market at home if our purchasing power is restored. Every time $200 is spent for goods and services it creates a job for another $100 per month more. Four million elders retiring make a place for an equal number of the unemployed; and if each of the 8,000,000 elders spend $200 per month, they create jobs for an equal number, thus wiping out the 12,000,000 now unemployed. Then, as these younger people are put to work and spend their pay checks, more work is created. Wages will increase when there is a demand for labor.

The money return from the proposed transaction tax will be equivalent to 2 percent on approximately six transactions from raw material to finished product. The proposed tax, therefore, will probably cause prices to rise from 10 to 12 percent. A $4 pair of shoes will probably cost from $4.40 to $4.50; but if the employee has $35 per week to pay for them instead of $20 as now, or none at all, the increase in cost of living will be more than compensated. Old man Competition will serve to keep prices down. Any manufacturer will tell you that he would rather pay a transaction tax of 2 percent and make money by spreading the overhead over 6 days' output than to have no transaction tax and lose money on an output of 2 days per week.

Now, may we revert to the place pensions play in the Townsend plan. If those of 60 years of age and over are induced to take permanent vacations, additional opportunity for employment will thereby accrue to the younger members of society. If a substantial group of our citizens have funds to enable them to live well, and are required to put those funds into circulation at once within the confines of our own territorial borders, increased markets will be created and increased employment will result, with increased wages for all who are employed. Money in circulation means business activity. Business activity creates opportunity. Opportunity provides individual incentive and stimulates personal industry. When there is work to do America insists upon the will to work—at least upon a willingness to work. When there is no work to be done "made" works results in "made" paupers. Shall we have relief for the ragged, or pensions with prosperity? Shall we have sustenance support for mendicants, or an honorarium for a happy home? Shall we have the dole for the doleful or recognition for the retired? Shall we forever be thinking of "over the hills to the poor house" or shall it be "beyond the horizon to the rewards of useful living"? Shall we not take a genuinely advanced step in social reform for the benefit of all our unemployed citizens in progressive, humanitarian America?

"Where there is no vision the people perish." Humanitarian America will have the vision. We will reimburse our law-abiding older members of society sufficient funds to guarantee real social security. Incidentally and automatically, but most important of all, in the operation of the Townsend plan there will come revival of opportunity for the younger citizens and blessings for business and trade generally. In a very literal sense of the word, "America is on the march."

America is done with the logic of laissez faire. But America will insist upon the preservation of the profit principle. Our very atmosphere begets individualism, but we will put an end to the evils of exploitation. Selfishness is inherent in human nature. But modern circumstances and Christian sanity require that Americans must avail themselves of intelligent vision in their manifestations of self-interest. No longer shall it be said that one-half of the world doesn't know how the other half lives. And certainly we must not allow it to be said that one-half of the world doesn't care how the other half lives.

One great political party has long been engaged in educating our public along the ideas of the high standard of living. More recently the spokesmen of another great political organization have intrigued our attention and interest with promises of the more abundant life. Advocates of the Townsend plan believe that a substantial measure of both of these worthy objectives may be attained only by bringing about widespread distribution of purchasing power. That is what the Townsend plan proposes to accomplish. Have the critics any better plan? If so, let us hear about it.

Now, shall we revert to the alphabetical symbols indicated in our topic, R. S. V. P.? Recovery to a high standard of living; stabilization of industrial production along the lines of economic progress; vision to accomplish and make real a high standard of living with a fair chance for the more abundant life for all of our people; and a pension for the law-abiding citizens, eligible for honorable retirement, to become the widely scattered and efficient distributing agents of purchasing power for the benefit of the whole economic order. Recovery, stabilization, vision, pension—R. S. V. P.

STREAM POLLUTION IN UNITED STATES

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein a radio speech delivered by the senior Senator from Connecticut.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address of Hon. AUGUSTINE LONERGAN, Senator from Connecticut, December 23, 1935:

Stream pollution and its control represent an important problem of vital interest to our public health. Too often in times of stress and strain we tend toward measures for our economic and financial improvement and push into the background those problems related to our public welfare, our educational needs, and our public health—which, fundamentally, are of great importance to our stability and happiness.

As a young man I often heard it said that God made the rivers, but men made them sewers. I was not fully conscious of the significance of that statement until some time afterward, when I was appointed to a board which studied methods of treating sewage dumped into streams in Connecticut. What I learned then has since been the cause of growing interest in stream purification.

No person who has been in actual contact with a defiled stream, with its stench and discoloration, affecting both the nostril and the eye, or who has seen contagion spread by its germ-laden waters from one city to another, or who has seen the destruction of fish and aquatic life along its shores, will ever again turn a deaf ear toward proposals intended to remedy such conditions.

To understand just what the problem of stream pollution is you should know, first of all, what the causes of pollution are. First is the pollution by sewage from our increasing city populations. Second is the pollution from industries which use various chemical processes and discharge the residue into the streams. Third is the pollution by oil deposits thrown into our waters by industries or by craft used in navigation, and fourth is the pollution caused by acids flowing from abandoned coal mines. I shall illustrate a few cases.

In New York Harbor it is estimated that 5,000,000 gallons of sewage are discharged each day, carrying approximately 800 tons of organic matter, and its general effect is manifested in the reduced oxygen content, detrimental to maintenance of aquatic life and to the self-purification of streams.

Another example of sewage pollution is the Delaware River. Cities along its course discharge tremendous quantities of sewage into it hourly. It is estimated that Philadelphia alone pours from 150,000,000 to 200,000,000 gallons of sewage into the lower Delaware daily. Wind blows odors from vast quantities of undigested sewage in the river onto the New Jersey shores, making living conditions very uncomfortable, especially in warm weather. Ships are said to shun their docks at times because the gases arising from decomposition discolor the ship's paint, attack the caulking, open seams, and make occupation of ships by passengers and crew while in the docks almost unbearable.

Or take the case of a mine which pumps sulphuric acid drainage into a stream to save the cost of pumping it or of properly treating the sewage; or the case of a tannery putting an unbelievable amount of pollution into a stream which has very little pollution from other sources; or a paper-pulp or soda-ash mill which discharges chemical refuse; or an iron and steel processing company which uses pickling acid to take rust scales from iron and then dumps the acid into nearby streams.

Notable examples of pollution have been found in the Nation's Capital here in Washington, where the Potomac River for many miles is unsuitable for bathing and where someone recently discovered that a stream flowing through a large public golf course was carrying a high percentage of waste matter from a large hospital. Golf balls, driven into the stream, were often retrieved with bare hands by persons who had no knowledge of conditions and whose fingers soon afterward came into contact with the mouth through cigarettes or candies. Children, enjoying one of the Nation's best parks here in Washington, have been wading for years in the same stream.

These are common situations on every watershed in the country. Slowly but certainly the Nation is becoming aroused over it. People see not only the grave danger to public health but a vast destruction of fish and wildlife, and a serious effect upon real-estate values in areas where pollution odors or commercial disadvantages arising from pollution make the locations unattractive. In some instances communities have seen not only their fisheries but also their ice industries entirely disappear. There are few remaining streams in the country from which ice can safely be taken for use in the home.

States have attempted to solve these problems by passing pollution-control laws, but their enforcement has often been ineffective, first because of inadequate funds, and second because the States soon come to realize that neighboring States are dumping pollutants into streams so rapidly that regardless of their own house cleaning, pollution constantly increases. A drifting attitude has resulted, and the need for vigorous action becomes more apparent daily. Legal actions by one State against another for dumping pollution into interstate streams have been attempted, but have been discouraged by the Supreme Court for reasons convincingly set forth by the late Mr. Justice Holmes. Attempts to establish uniform laws against polluters, applicable to various States, have also been tried sporadically throughout the country, but with little or no success.

Formation of compacts between States on an interstate stream have been encouraged, but not successfully tested. Such compacts are permissible under the Constitution, and must be authorized and approved by Congress and also by the State legislatures. There are no such compacts in relation to pollution control alone in existence, but in some of the irrigation compacts in western arid regions pollution control enters into the agreements. In these districts the importance of water is emphasized by need for agriculture and human consumption. In less arid regions, where compacts or voluntary agreements have been attempted, they have failed of accomplishment or have not been entirely satisfactory.

New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut are now in the process of entering into a compact under authorization by the last session of Congress, but it remains to be seen just how successful this effort will be.

There is not a great deal of information from foreign countries on which we can base some new plan, with definite assurance of success, although England and Germany have gone much further than other countries in cleaning up their streams. Germany endeavors to prevent pollution with proper laws before the streams are actually defiled, stressing the importance of prevention, rather than cure. Once their streams have been contaminated, they are cleaned up by a procedure and financing whereby industries, municipalities, and waterworks associations become members of a sanitary water district. Industries and municipalities outside of the district and not members, may be compelled to pay their share of the costs if they receive benefits from the works of the district or contribute to the pollution. Moreover, Germany has made a scientific study of sewage treatment, so that waste matter which formerly was dumped into streams is now converted into useful byproducts. Some cities have installed equipment which changes sewage into gas for fuel, and into soaps and oils for other uses by the city governments, thus greatly curtailing their expenditures for these necessities. Many German industrialists who were formerly noted polluters have noted the results and have found that they can convert their plant wastes into byproducts which more than pay for the cost of necessary equipment in some cases.

More than a year ago I saw the problem of pollution control in the United States become somewhat of a national emergency. I called a conference of experts to meet in Washington with the Secretary of War. The conference selected a committee of five persons to draft a plan for transmittal to the President.

The committee divided its opinion on two plans, one of which favored a continuation of the present plan of encouraging cooperation between the States by compacts or agreements, and the other plan favoring a vigorous program by the Federal Government to supplement State activities. The Federal plan boldly asserted the supremacy of the Federal jurisdiction over the interstate navigable waters and of the tributaries thereof, from which pollution is carried or washed into the navigable portion of the stream. It contended that the control now exercised by the Federal Government over water pollution does not rest in the commerce clause of the Constitution alone, but is found also in the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction clause, the welfare clause, the migratory bird treaty, and the power to protect national fisheries. The report of the Federal plan also included a specific recommendation for necessary laws to make it effective.

Following our Washington conference, the National Resources Board, through its advisory committee on water pollution, made a detailed study of the subject and recently published a preliminary report which contains much useful information and many helpful recommendations. The report admits that "on the whole the settlement of interstate controversies relating to the use or control of water, including its pollution, is not handled on a satisfactory basis."

The report favors further tests by the Federal Government in the formation of compacts, in rendering financial assistance to the States, municipalities, and to cooperative industries, and in acting in an advisory and educational capacity by conducting research work into the subject. It also recommends an experimental program on the Potomac River and its headwaters in the vicinity of Washington to show the States what can be done in preventing pollution or in controlling or eliminating it in streams already polluted. Active coordination and stimulation of local measures of control was also recommended, and the committee set up an outline of specific steps which any State can adopt under its constitutional police power to attempt to control pollution on its own waters.

A significant statement in the report of the National Resources Committee is this: "There is no appreciable demand indicated by State agencies for an extension of Federal control over water pollution."

I understand that this statement was based largely upon questionnaires sent out to the various State agencies, and it no doubt reflects what those agencies honestly believe is the view of the people in their States. However, there has been such utter apathy on the part of many persons, including State enforcement officials themselves, as a result of years of unsuccessful attempts to control pollution at home, and particularly on the large interstate waterways, that I wonder whether the public has actually been interested enough to express itself through its State agencies.

Many persons who originally were vigorous in their demands for stream purification, having noted futile attempts to correct the situation, no longer go to the trouble even to complain about pollution to their State agencies, thus making it difficult for these agencies to judge exactly what the public wants.

Many of the militant individuals in the States who have had the courage to continue the fight have joined State and national organizations having stream purification as one of their chief objectives. It is these organizations whose opinions I believe more accurately reflect the views of the American people. These organizations have as their members thousands of men and women devoting themselves to a cause for the love and worthiness of it. They have no axes to grind, and are not seeking remuneration for their efforts. They are voluntary workers, coming from every corner of the country. The most enthusiastic of these are members of organizations such as the Izaak Walton League and various fish and game associations and sportsmen's clubs and conservation groups. Among their leaders are many of the persons who attended the Washington Conference a year ago, including Dr. D'Arcy Magee, vice president of the Izaak Walton League of America, and Grover C. Ladner, deputy attorney general of Pennsylvania, who is prominently affiliated with many conservation organizations and as counsel in river-pollution cases. Others who have been active include S. B. Locke, conservation director of the Izaak Walton League, and officials of the American Game Association and affiliated groups, and numerous officials in the Government service.

It may seem curious to some that sports and wildlife and conservation organizations seem to be taking the most active part. The likely reason is that they are the persons who see the results of pollution by personal contact. They wade the streams and see fish lying dead by hundreds and thousands. They have waded through streams so filthy and so nauseating that their love of nature, if nothing else, impels them to do something about the situation. People primarily interested in public health have a multitude of health problems to consider, and may not observe the same results unless contagion or certain diseases break out which accurately can be traced to pollution.

Now just what is it that these organizations and individuals propose to do? If, as I have suggested, they represent a fair cross-section of the American people, what is their plan?

I can answer that in a general way by stating that after completion of our Washington Conference the two plans formulated by our special committee were sent to all conferees for a vote. The majority of them favored the plan of vigorous Federal action. Since then the Federal plan has met with universal approval by all conservation organizations who have heard of it, including the Delaware River Tri-State Anti-Pollution Conference, the anti-pollution committee of the American Fisheries Society, the American Game Conference, the Pennsylvania Federation of Sportsmen's Clubs, the West Virginia Affiliated Sportsmen's Association, the Kanawha Game and Fish Association of West Virginia, the Norfolk (Va.) Chapter of the Izaak Walton League, and by the American Game Conference at its convention in New York.

Their plan, which I have described as the Federal plan, is based upon the following propositions:

First, that pure water, next to air, is the most absolute necessity of life. Stream-pollution abatement is not a mere luxury to be ranked with what might be called comfort improvements, such as new roads, bridges, public buildings, and the like, but it is so absolute a necessity that to temporize longer with the problem is to court national disaster.

Second, the very worst stream pollution is to be found in the great interstate waterways and their tributaries. Therefore it has ceased to be a mere matter of local interest. It has become a matter of national concern.

Third, that industrial pollution and municipal sewage pollution must be attacked as a single problem and at the same time. Taxpayers will spend no money to clean public streams which industries continue to use as private sewers.

Fourth, that the most effective argument that industrial polluters advance against enforcement of antipollution laws by their States is the plea that they should not be put at a competitive disadvantage with industries located in other States that fail to act. While this argument is more plausible than sound, it is very effective with the public. It causes confusion and hesitation, which weakens the drive for strict enforcement in any State.

Fifth, that both municipalities and industries very generally plead lack of funds.

Summarized, these propositions demand a new approach to the problem, and a plan which would meet the following requirements: (a) Provide uniformity of enforcement, bearing down equally on industries as well as municipalities irrespective of location; (b) provide for immediate installation of sewage-disposal plants and trade waste treatment works by furnishing funds for both; and (c) provide a watershed-pollution control irrespective of State boundaries.

Obviously these requirements can only be met through the intervention of the Federal Government. If it does intervene, a central authority must be set up or powers conferred upon some existing agency to conduct the following activities:

1. To attempt through State cooperation to obtain uniformity of State laws, procedures, and enforcement of water-pollution preventive and corrective measures.

2. To assist the proper State agency in the studies necessary to determine the extent of the pollution of any waters within the State, to establish standards of purity of these waters, and to determine the necessary corrective measures for attaining these standards.

3. To direct that studies be made by existing agencies of the Federal Government qualified to make such studies of such interstate watersheds as appear necessary and to finance these studies.

4. To determine from the studies the area of each interstate watershed to be established as a water-pollution-abatement district, to be known thereafter as the sanitary water district, and to set up for that district standards of purity and minimum requirements as to treatment of polluting material before the same is discharged into the waters thereof.

5. To create for each sanitary water district so established by the national board a sanitary water district board, the number to be determined by the national board; such boards to be given authority to require abatement and prevention of all water pollution within the area of the district, to require installation of such sewage-disposal plants and such treatment works for industrial works as may be necessary to cleanse, protect, and safeguard the purity of the waters within the district and to arrange for the necessary financing and construction of the required sewage-disposal plants and treatment works of industrial waste by offering Government loans.

Such a program should also specifically reserve the right of any individual or persons or corporation or any municipality or community suffering injury by reason of the pollution of his or its waters to bring action for damages or the abatement thereof which he or they may now have under the present law of the States concerned. Other provisions safeguarding the States and individuals in their existing rights would also be included, the main purpose of the whole plan being vigorous Federal action to supplement and stimulate State action, and not to interfere in any way with the States in their own efforts.

Amendments would also be submitted to existing laws to strengthen enforcement of the Deposits of Refuse Act and the Oil Pollution Act, by which the Federal Government already has limited powers of control over pollution on interstate waters.

I have been requested to inaugurate the Federal plan of these organizations. Thus far no definite legislation has been introduced in Congress, although there are indications that as a result of the report of the National Resources Committee the administration may now be drafting such legislation for the coming session.

Such a program of stream purification at this time would comply with the President's policy of providing unemployment relief by worth-while public works. Government loans and financial assistance would under the plan stimulate construction of adequate sewage-disposal plants and industrial trade waste treatment plants and would give employment to many now out of work.

But this is not the only benefit, nor the greatest. Following it would come the inestimable benefits of health protection, the return of millions of dollars' worth of food fish to our principal streams, the restoration of the natural-ice industry along some waters, and the restoration of recreational and industrial use of waterways that are now an offense to the sight, a stench to the nostrils, and an excessive burden to navigation. Added to this would be the tremendous savings to the great cities of the Nation that must now or later spend hundreds of millions for new sources of water supply unless the pollution of their present sources is abated and the purity thereof forever protected.

The time has come when the public should express itself effectively upon this subject. If you believe in the Federal plan, notify your State agencies or your Representatives or Senators in Congress or the President or his National Resources Board. As Dr. Theobold Smith, eminent authority on public health, said not so long ago:

"The American people must destroy water pollution or it will destroy us."

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

Mr. THOM, for 2 weeks, on account of illness.

Mr. SCRUGHAM, for 4 days, on account of illness.

Mr. DUFFY of New York, for 3 days, on account of illness.

Mr. MAAS (at the request of Mr. PITTENGER), for 10 days, on account of death in family.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 31 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, January 7, 1936, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

543. A letter from the Chairman of the United States Tariff Commission, transmitting the Nineteenth Annual Report of the United States Tariff Commission, in compliance with the provisions of section 332 of the act of Congress approved June 17, 1930 (H. Doc. No. 326); to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed.

544. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report dated January 2, 1936, from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on Salt River, Mo., made under the provisions of section 10 of the Flood Control Act approved May 15, 1928, together with accompanying papers and illustrations; to the Committee on Flood Control.

545. A letter from the Archivist, transmitting the First Annual Report of the Archivist of the United States, covering the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935; to the Committee on the Library.

546. A letter from the Attorney General, transmitting a list of suits arising under the act of March 9, 1920 (41 Stat. 525), authorizing suits against the United States in admiralty involving merchant vessels, in which final decrees were entered against the United States, exclusive of cases on appeal; to the Committee on Claims.

547. A letter from the Attorney General, transmitting a list of suits arising under the Public Vessel Act of March 3, 1925 (43 Stat. 1112), in which final decrees were entered, exclusive of cases on appeal; to the Committee on Claims.

548. A letter from the Attorney General, transmitting the annual report of the Department of Justice for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1935 (H. Doc. No. 319); to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

549. A letter from the Attorney General, transmitting, as required by the text of the appropriation "Pay of special assistant attorneys" contained in the Department of Justice Appropriation Act, 1936, approved March 22, 1935, a report showing the special assistants employed under said appropriation and pay or payable therefrom, the rate of compensation, the amounts paid, and a description of the duties; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

550. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the annual report of the activities of the National Board for the Promotion of Rifle Practice for the fiscal year 1935; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

551. A letter from the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, transmitting a report of activities of the Veterans' Administration for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1935 (H. Doc. No. 322); to the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation and ordered to be printed.

552. A letter from the Attorney General, transmitting a statement of the expenditures under appropriations for the United States Court of Patent Appeals for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1935; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

553. A letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting reports of the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year 1935 on Federal-aid road work and forest roads and trails as required by section 19 of the Federal Highway Act approved November 9, 1921 (42 Stat. 216); to the Committee on Roads.

554. A letter from the Chairman of the District of Columbia-Virginia Boundary Line Commission, transmitting a report of the Commission created by the act of Congress approved March 21, 1934, to determine the boundary line between the District of Columbia and the State of Virginia and to provide for the settlement of claims to property along or affected by said boundary line (H. Doc. No. 374); to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

555. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1935 (H. Doc. No. 315); to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed.

556. A letter from the Postmaster General, transmitting the report of operation of the Postal Savings System for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1935 (H. Doc. No. 327); to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

557. A letter from the Clerk of the House of Representatives, transmitting information in regards to the contest for a seat in the House of Representatives from the Twentieth District of New York (H. Doc. No. 383); to the Committee on Elections No. 1 and ordered to be printed.

558. A letter from the Clerk of the House of Representatives, transmitting information in regards to the contest for a seat in the House of Representatives from the Territory of Hawaii (H. Doc. No. 384); to the Committee on Elections No. 2 and ordered to be printed.

559. A letter from the Clerk of the House of Representatives, transmitting information in regards to the contest for a seat in the House of Representatives from the Nineteenth Congressional District of the State of Ohio (H. Doc. No. 385); to the Committee on Elections No. 3 and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 3 of rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ELLENBOGEN: A bill (H. R. 9665) to repeal the Potato Act of 1935, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. BOEHNE: A bill (H. R. 9666) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River between Rockport, Ind., and Owensboro, Ky.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. LUDLOW: A bill (H. R. 9667) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. MAVERICK: A bill (H. R. 9668) to preserve and maintain peace between the United States and foreign nations, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. PARKS: A bill (H. R. 9669) to establish the rank of general and lieutenant general for certain Army commands; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SMITH of Virginia: A bill (H. R. 9670) to define, survey, and mark the boundary between Virginia and the District of Columbia as laid down in the report of the District of Columbia-Virginia Boundary Commission and to authorize the expenditure necessary; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts: A bill (H. R. 9671) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of material to the sea scout department of the Boy Scouts of America; to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. CULKIN: A bill (H. R. 9672) for the taxation of oleomargarine; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. BURNHAM: A bill (H. R. 9673) to authorize the recoinage of 50-cent pieces in connection with the California-Pacific International Exposition to be held in San Diego, Calif., in 1936; to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

By Mr. HOFFMAN: A bill (H. R. 9674) to repeal sections 311a, 316a, 316b, 405a, 448–448e, inclusive, 734a, and 734b of title 31 of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. LANHAM: A bill (H. R. 9675) relating to filing of petitions with the Board of Tax Appeals; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SMITH of Virginia: A bill (H. R. 9676) to repeal an act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to sell the Weather Bureau station known as "Mount Weather", in the counties of Loudoun and Clarke in the State of Virginia; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9677) to amend the act of March 4, 1915 (38 Stat. 1068–1069), authorizing the President to transfer to the active list of the Army certain officers on the retired list; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HILDEBRANDT: A bill (H. R. 9678) to extend for 1 year contracts covering existing star routes; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. STUBBS: A bill (H. R. 9679) to amend the immigration laws, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. LUNDEEN: A bill (H. R. 9680) to provide for the establishment of a Nation-wide system of social insurance; to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. RAYBURN: A bill (H. R. 9681) to promote electrification in rural areas and to provide facilities for the financing thereof, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. ZIONCHECK: Resolution (H. Res. 386) to authorize an investigation of old-age-pension schemes; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. DINGELL: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 428) directing the President of the United States to proclaim October 11 of each year General Pulaski's Memorial Day for the observance and commemoration of the death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ANDREWS of New York: A bill (H. R. 9682) for the relief of Walter L. Shelley; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9683) for the relief of Clyde W. Snell; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. ALLEN: A bill (H. R. 9684) granting a pension to Lizzie May Schaber; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9685) granting a pension to Sarah A. King; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9686) granting a pension to Emma Wood; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9687) granting a pension to Ethel S. Ferguson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9688) granting an increase of pension to Ernestine Singer; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9689) granting an increase of pension to Ada Plattenberger; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9690) granting an increase of pension to Anna Flint; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9691) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth Diehl; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9692) granting an increase of pension to Maria A. Houston; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9693) granting an increase of pension to Martha C. Howe; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9694) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth Snyder; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BLAND: A bill (H. R. 9695) granting a pension to William Turner; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BREWSTER: A bill (H. R. 9696) granting a pension to Maria B. Thompson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9697) granting a pension to Annie S. Nealley; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CLARK of Idaho: A bill (H. R. 9698) for the relief of Ned Williams; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9699) granting an honorable discharge to James B. Kilbourne; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9700) granting a pension to Dean Larson; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9701) granting a pension to Billy George; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9702) granting a pension to William R. S. Lane; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CREAL: A bill (H. R. 9703) granting a pension to Louise F. Mansfield; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9704) granting a pension to Mary Miller; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9705) granting a pension to Mattie L. Stults; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9706) granting a pension to Frances Vaughn; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9707) granting a pension to Jim Merideth; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9708) granting a pension to Simpson Pennington; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9709) granting a pension to Julia Lyon; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9710) granting a pension to Mary J. Logsdon; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9711) granting an increase of pension to Sallie Miller; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9712) granting a pension to Nancy Ann Laird; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9713) granting an increase of pension to Winnie Hazard; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9714) granting an increase of pension to Martha R. Henderson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9715) granting an increase of pension to Martha J. Blacketer; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9716) granting an increase of pension to Mariah Buchanan; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9717) granting a pension to Martha Kasinger; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9718) granting a pension to Arthur Pate; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9719) granting a pension to Gorda James; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9720) granting a pension to William H. Jones; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9721) granting a pension to George Merideth; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9722) granting a pension to Alwilda Brooks; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9723) granting a pension to Mary E. Sutherland; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9724) granting a pension to Mattie Bumgardner; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DUFFEY of Ohio: A bill (H. R. 9725) granting a pension to Marie Brown; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FORD of California: A bill (H. R. 9726) for the relief of Frank Duffy; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9727) for the relief of M. C. Carnicle; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. GILDEA: A bill (H. R. 9728) for the relief of Benjamin Lucas; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. GIFFORD: A bill (H. R. 9729) granting a pension to Fannie L. Leonard: to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9730) granting a pension to Mary Banks Fuller; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GRAY of Indiana: A bill (H. R. 9731) granting an increase of pension to Roy Smith; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9732) granting a pension to Margaret Thurman; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GRISWOLD: A bill (H. R. 9733) granting a pension to Sarah E. Goine; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HALLECK: A bill (H. R. 9734) for the relief of John H. Sullivan; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9735) for the relief of Merril M. Chenoweth; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9736) granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Vigus; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9737) granting an increase of pension to John H. Sullivan; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HANCOCK of New York: A bill (H. R. 9738) granting a pension to Mary Metzger; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9739) granting a pension to Minnie Smith; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9740) granting a pension to Nettie J. Brown; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9741) granting a pension to Catherine J. Hoyer; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9742) granting an increase of pension to Caroline Appelt; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9743) granting an increase of pension to Hattie J. Doolittle; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9744) granting an increase of pension to Matilda A. Button; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9745) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth Miller; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9746) granting an increase of pension to Catherine B. McCarthy; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9747) granting an increase of pension to Sarah Seward; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9748) granting an increase of pension to Bridget Haley; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9749) granting an increase of pension to Jennie V. Myers; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HILDEBRANDT: A bill (H. R. 9750) for the relief of William C. Willahan; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. HOUSTON: A bill (H. R. 9751) granting a pension to Marth Ella Downing; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9752) for the relief of Zachara T. Edwards; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9753) granting a pension to Lillie Z. Devin; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9754) granting a pension to Hulda S. Dick; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9755) granting a pension to Azelle V. Crawford; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, JANUARY 7, 1936

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Heavenly Father, may we hear Thee saying in the stillness of our souls: "Fear God and keep My commandments, for this is the whole duty of man." In our needs and in our aspirations may we drink deeply of the spirit of our Master. Keep the vision of our understanding strong and clear, that we may vividly recognize the claims of high character, of duty, and of the public service. Blessed Lord God, in the face of this strange, tumultuous, and mysterious world, with its wealth of emotion and power, we entreat Thee to hold us as we beat a pathway through its forbidding tides. Help us to sing the morning song of temperance, endurance, and patience. With Thy Holy Spirit consecrate a shrine and sanctuary in our breasts and give us fortitude and wisdom that shall stand the shock of time. In our Savior's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object to these 5 minutes, and I shall not object to any gentleman on the other side having 5 minutes, but I want to reiterate a statement I made yesterday that this day has been set down for consideration of the Private Calendar. A great many gentlemen are interested in securing consideration of that calendar. Although it is very unpleasant, I feel that I shall have to object to any further remarks.

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman from Alabama object to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not object to this request nor shall I object to a statement from the gentleman on the other side, but I shall object to any further requests.

Mr. SNELL. Further reserving the right to object, I want to ask the majority leader a question. Will the program tomorrow be the independent offices bill, with an opportunity for general debate?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will yield to the gentleman from Virginia to answer that question.

Mr. WOODRUM. The present intention is to call up the independent offices appropriation bill tomorrow, and an opportunity will be given in general debate for Members to make speeches.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Reserving the right to object, I want to make a statement on behalf of the Interior Appropriations Subcommittee. The committee has finished hearings as far as the executive officers are concerned, but if any Member of the House desires to come before the subcommittee tomorrow we shall be glad to hear them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. MAPES. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the majority leader a question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MAPES. The morning paper speaks of a possibility that the bonus may be brought up tomorrow or Thursday. Can the gentleman give us any information in regard to that?

Mr. BANKHEAD. In reply to the gentleman's question, I will state that as far as I know this is the situation: I saw it stated in the papers that the Committee on Ways and Means yesterday afternoon had reported out the so-called "bonus" bill. Of course, before that bill can have consideration a special rule will have to be passed. I do not know whether the chairman of the Committee on Rules, the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], who is present, has been approached in connection with that matter or not. Nor do I know at this time what is in the mind of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means with reference to the consideration of the bonus bill, but there will be no disposition to delay its consideration. Of course, it is a matter that would have to be determined by the Committee on Rules. If the gentleman from New York would like to make a statement in that connection, I shall yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I might state that I have not been approached, and there has been no intimation to the Committee on Rules up to this moment of any request for a rule.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I do not see the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means on the floor at the moment and I am not authorized to speak for him, but I think I can rightly refer to the way the matter was left in the Committee on Ways and Means last night. It was understood by the members of the committee that a rule would be asked for and there was some question whether we would go on with the Ways and Means bonus bill tomorrow or wait until the independent offices appropriation bill is disposed of.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Of course, the Committee on Rules is functioning.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I trust that answers the inquiry of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. That shows the befuddled condition of the whole matter.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, no; it is not befuddled at all.

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Supreme Court of the United States declared the Agricultural Adjustment Act unconstitutional. During the session yesterday the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] made some very appropriate remarks in which he challenged the membership of this House to meet the emergencies and the problems which now confront the 6,000,000 farm families of America. As a Member of this House it is my pleasure to accept the challenge which has been laid before this House by the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina. If you will investigate the record of the House you will find that on May 31, 1935, during the last session of this Congress, I introduced a measure which will permanently relieve the farmers of this Nation and which will solve the problem that now confronts the 6,000,000 farm families of America. I refer to H. R. 8286, an act to provide homesteads free of debt for actual farm families. This bill is not inspired by "brain trusters", neither is it dictated by the executive branch of our Government, but it has its origin and birth in the legislative branch of the United States Government, where all other legislation should have its origin and birth. [Applause.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Was the bill prepared by the gentleman himself?

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. It was prepared by the gentleman from Georgia, who is now speaking, written by him on a Government typewriter in his own office. This bill is not socialistic, it is not communistic, it is not dictatorial, nor autocratic, but is in strict harmony with the fundamental principles of free government. It is the very essence of Jeffersonian democracy itself, which I have heard Members of the House on numerous occasions extol so highly.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. MONAGHAN. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the Supreme Court, as long as it retains the power to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional, might yet declare the gentleman's act constitutional.

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, it is not my duty and function to tear down the Constitution of the United States [applause], but to uphold it and protect our system of government.

I appeal to all the Members of this House, including the gentlemen of the Republican side of the aisle, if you believe in the individual rights of American citizens, to lay down your partisan politics and join with me in enacting a measure that is in complete harmony with the individual and inalienable rights of every citizen of America.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. MONAGHAN. I had not quite completed my statement. As a matter of fact, I suggest to the gentleman that in conformity with article III, section 2, of the Constitution of the United States, giving Congress power to regulate and except legislation from the Supreme Court's jurisdiction, that you add an amendment to your bill which will prevent the Supreme Court from declaring it unconstitutional.

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I am not here now to debate the Constitution of the United States, but to tell the Members of the House that there is legislation of a permanent nature before them, which is right, which is in harmony with the principles of our American government, which is the very essence of Jeffersonian democracy, and which has been placed upon the desk of every Member of Congress for his perusal and study.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. How many persons would that take care of?

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. It will take care of every citizen of America who desires to earn an honest living in freedom and independence.

The farmers and the people of this Nation do not desire a dole. They do not desire to be given something. They desire nothing except an opportunity to earn an honest living in freedom and independence, which they are not now receiving under our present economic structure.

My friends, this bill has been placed before every Member, and likewise has been sent to your homes, so that it is before you. In a few days another copy of it will be placed on your desks, and I urge your support of it. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PETERSON] has expired.

MANDATORY NEUTRALITY LEGISLATION

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing a speech which I delivered over the radio on the subject of neutrality.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include my address over Station WEVD, Thursday, January 2, 1936, as follows:

I cannot justify war. Phrases like "freedom of the seas", "neutral rights" cannot sweep me off my feet and make me vote for war.

Everyone wants peace. No one wants war.

That was the temper of our people, even in November 1916, when President Wilson was reelected because "he kept us out of war." In April 1917 we were fighting Germany and Austria "to save the world for democracy" and were told we went to war "to end all wars." We were swept into the war maelstrom despite our good intentions to preserve peace, despite our neutrality. All our notes of protestation concerning violations of our rights as neutrals were as unavailing as snow falling upon an iceberg.

That shall not happen again.

There shall be no haphazard drifting, no aimless shifting, no futile note sending.

We are neutral. We must remain so.

We can only remain fixed in that idea if we have a clear, well-defined policy of neutrality.

We laid the foundations for this policy in the first session of the pending Congress. After great difficulty, skirting by prospective war profiteers, unthinking but well-intentioned patriotic societies and professional war heroes of the Army and the Navy—we passed provisions for—

1. Mandatory embargoes upon arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent nations.

2. Prohibition of transportation of munitions and implements of war by vessels of the United States for use of belligerent nations.

3. Registration and licensing of munition and implement of war exporters, importers, and transporters at all times.

4. Restriction of travel by American citizens on ships owned by belligerents during the war.

This act terminates February 29, 1936. It will be renewed without question.

Under this act the President is empowered to list and define exactly the arms, munitions, and war implements thus banned. On September 27 President Roosevelt proclaimed a lengthy list. A National Munitions Control Board has been established, composed of the Secretaries of War, Navy, Commerce, Treasury, and State, with the administration of the Board in the Department of State. By November 29 all manufacturers and exporters of munitions were listed. They can no longer ship without a permit from the Board.

But that is only the beginning—the foundation. The public has manifested wholehearted approval.

A superstructure is necessary. We must and we shall pass in the coming session, in addition to an extension of the act that expires February 29, 1936:

1. Prohibition of loans and credits to belligerent nations.

2. Application of strict embargoes upon contraband materials besides munitions and implements of war. This would include oil, cotton, steel, scrap iron, wheat, etc.

This policy of embargoes on contraband materials may shock many. But certainly we cannot revert to our old ideas of neutrality, our old ideas of freedom of sea and freedom of trade. They did not work. They finally dragged us into war, the very goal we sought to avoid.

As neutral from 1914 to 1917, we demanded the right to trade freely in war materials and every kind of goods with the warring nations. We recognized, however, the right of any belligerent to seize goods called contraband.

That was the rub. Practically every article the United States exported was made to appear as contraband. It was argued that under modern war conditions everything could be used to aid the enemy and were as important as guns and munitions. Only with the greatest difficulty, I suppose, could exemptions be secured for ostrich feathers or ukeleles. Everything else under the sun was taboo as contraband. Both Germany and England made life unbearable for us as neutrals with their constant seizure of contraband and submarine sinking. It was most difficult for us to defend our neutral rights as we then understood them. On April 6, 1917, we declared war against a flagrant violator of our rights and embraced the cause of another violator with whom we were doing business going up into the billions.

Neutrality was at an end. Neutrality had failed. We must, therefore, provide our own contraband list and embargo them. Thus an ounce of neutrality prevention will be worth a pound of war cure.

Some industries might be severely hurt with such a policy—industries like cotton and foodstuffs. We might remunerate agriculture and other legitimate activities excessively hurt by drastic reduction of foreign commerce. It might cost billions, but that cost is small when compared with the loss of thousands of lives, the wounding and maiming of thousands more, let alone the billions in pensions and bonus.

Concerning war loans and credits, I am confident that the great money lenders did much to force us into the war. We had done tremendous business with the Allies. They owed us billions for war materials and foodstuffs. The bankers said we could never be paid unless we loaned the Allies the money with which to pay. Lansing and Wilson fell for this argument and approved, in September 1915, the first Anglo-French loan of five hundred million. J. P. Morgan & Co. headed the banking syndicate. They had been the purchasing agent for the Allies. Thus our Government paid Morgan's customers. Our people are still carrying the bag. They still hold unpaid allied debts.

However, this is certain, you belie your neutrality when you loan money to one belligerent as against another. Through financing one side you become at once a friend and an enemy. A friend to the borrower, an enemy to the other warring nation. We should nevermore loan to either belligerent.

The present and proposed legislation will, of course, eliminate war profits, swollen fortunes marked with skulls and crossbones. Such neutrality policy or embargo legislation may practically mean complete abstention from trade with either warring nation. What of it? Should we not rather abstain than sacrifice the flower of our youth upon the altar of war? Is any war worth the billions in pensions that follow for 75 years? Some may argue that such neutrality may mean hauling down the flag. I think not. In any event, it will save us the wholesale slaughter and holocaust of war.

Legislation to be passed by Congress must be mandatory, not discretionary. The present law, which must be extended, is mandatory. To my mind neutrality means nothing if it is discretionary. What I have to say is no reflection upon our President, whom I revere and respect most highly. However, the minute we leave the invocation of embargoes and bans to the President he must then make up his mind to invoke or waive these bans and embargoes. The result is the taking sides in the midst of the quarrel or war. His judgment, therefore, is a judgment on the war itself. That is not remaining neutral. That is becoming partisan. In one case he will say this is a war in which we will remain neutral, take no sides and bar war essentials to either party. In another war he might say that one side is right and the other side is wrong, sending goods to one warring nation and refusing goods to the other. That would be the opposite of neutrality. If there were such discretion in the matter of the present war in Ethiopia and the President made a decision to help Ethiopia, that would be a decision to impair Italy's fighting strength. It may be that remaining absolutely neutral would be tantamount to helping Italy and hurting Ethiopia. That is unfortunate. Many may have deepest sympathy for Ethiopia. Others sympathize with Italy. We should take no sides in this or any other foreign war. We must, in the words of Washington, remain outside of all foreign entanglements. We cannot, for example, consider Ethiopia undivorced from the aims and aspirations of her allies, England and France. We must remember that Italy, in dismembering Ethiopia, may be no more guilty than England in dismembering the Boer Republic and India, and Japan, in its incursions into Manchuria and north China.

England and France knew of Mussolini's designs more than a year ago, when he first made preparations. Why did they delay opposition? The Committee of Five of the League of Nations petitioned Ethiopia last year. Haile Selassie was forced to accept their demands. Eventually the League Council objected. Strangely enough, Russia and Turkey, in outlining their objections, pointed out the insincerity of England and France. The latter two at that time did not show much concern over Ethiopia. Now they are concerned. Italy is interfering and may impair their own imperialistic designs. Witness the rather disgraceful proposals put forward by Laval and Hoare, which the House of Commons, with great righteousness, rejected. Laval is a gentleman of great cunning, who usually plays both ends to the middle. Strangely enough, the name "Laval", spelled from the right or left, continues to be "Laval." Sir Samuel Hoare was not good at balancing, either. He injured his nose skating on the ice in Switzerland, and he stubbed his toe on Ethiopia.

Neutrality must be deemed more important than saying one side is right and the other side wrong. We must be neutral, as a matter of policy, regardless of the nations that do the fighting, regardless of the issues involved. If any issue is to be determined, same should be done by Congress, by the direct representatives of the people. As an illustration of how neutrality may work, already Governor Earle, Senator GUFFEY, and other influential citizens of Pennsylvania have been importuning the President, it is reported, to refrain from putting any embargo on oil and coal. Such embargoes might hurt Pennsylvania. The President should be relieved of such pressure. Other States affected by embargoes would do likewise. For these reasons I believe the power should be mandatory, not discretionary.

The State Department does well also to warn all parties to keep out of the war zone. This is necessary to avoid catastrophe, such as that of the Lusitania that inflame and infuriate the people and are encouragements to professional war patrioteers.

Such warnings to depart from the war zones should be heeded by all, including missionaries in Ethiopia. It was horrible for the Italians to bombard the American mission hospital property with the American flag prominently displayed. Nevertheless, it were better for the missionaries to evacuate that property for the time being and thus follow the admonitions of the State Department.

The State Department also does well, in addition to warnings of personal risk, to seek to discourage profiteering by holding as far as it can to the normal cargoes like oil, coal, steel, scrap iron, which are the necessities of war. Thus it prevents blood money by way of abnormal profits.

Finally, we are preventing the sailing of ships carrying war materials when the Government has a financial interest in such ships or where our Shipping Board exercises control, i. e., S. S. Ulysses.

To recapitulate, my idea of neutrality is:

First. Mandatory provisions against loans to warring nations.

Second. Mandatory embargoes upon war materials.

Third. No discretionary power to interfere with such neutrality.

THE TOWNSEND PLAN

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing a speech which I delivered over the radio in opposition to the Townsend plan.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include my address in opposition to the Townsend plan, delivered over Station WABC and the Columbia Broadcasting Co.'s network on Saturday, December 28, 1935, as follows:

Congressman-elect VERNER W. MAIN, of Michigan, who preceded me, claims he was asked to respond in favor of the Townsend plan. I have not seen his address, but he states that he was asked "Respondez s'il vous plait." He made a play on these words, "Respondez s'il vous plait", and said that they embraced the Townsend plan because the "R" stands for "recovery", the "S" stands for "stabilization", the "V" stands for "vision", and the "P" stands for "pension."

I respond in another way and say that the "R" stands for "ruin", the "S" stands for "slough of despond", the "V" stands for "vale of despair", and the "P" stands for "poverty."

I was amongst those who, in a standing vote in the House, voted down decisively an amendment to the social-security bill, embodying the so-called Townsend plan, known as the old-age revolving pension plan, which proposes that all citizens over 60 years of age be paid $200 per month, on condition that all gainful occupation be abandoned and that the $200 be spent in the United States before each month ends; that the money to pay such pensions is to be raised by a 2-percent tax on all so-called business transactions.

Not only did I vote against such a scheme last April, but I shall vote against it every time opportunity affords. I shall strike at it every time this preposterous economic monster rears its ugly head. In the coming session of Congress strenuous efforts will be made to get favorable consideration on H. R. 7154, the so-called McGroarty bill, which embodies this ridiculous plan.

However well-intentioned Congressman-elect MAIN and Dr. Townsend may be, the old-age revolving pensions idea is utterly impossible and absurd. Were we not subject to such national, economic suffering, the mere suggestion of such a plan would be laughed to scorn, Congressman-elect MAIN notwithstanding. But in times of stress we have, and always will have, such buncombe as a Coxey's army, a technocracy, an Upton Sinclair's E. P. I. C.—and now we have the Townsend plan. However, this plan cannot be disregarded or easily shunted aside. It has already made considerable headway, particularly in some sections of the West, where it seems to be going like a house on fire. We should not wait until the conflagration spreads to the East. Years ago we in the East thought prohibition was a fantastic scheme that could make no headway. We let it go by default. Had we met the issue earlier, perhaps prohibition would not have made such rapid strides. We should not make the same blunder with reference to the Townsend plan.

There is a sort of religious hysteria embodied in this plan. The convention recently held in Chicago was something in the nature of a revival. It not only is an old folks' crusade but an economic drive in terms of religion, wherein speeches are not one-half as important as the singing of hymns. It is this very spiritual enthusiasm which makes the plan doubly dangerous and more difficult to scotch.

Only patient, wise, and cautious opposition will serve as an antidote, and rid the body politic of this rash of Townsenditis.

Before discussing the plan in detail I must remind Congressman-elect MAIN that not a single economist or businessman of consequence has endorsed this bucolic fantasy.

As originally proposed, the Townsend plan provided that everyone over 60 years of age, even if he were a John D. Rockefeller or a J. Pierpont Morgan, would be paid $200 monthly, and would be required to spend all of it in a month and accept enforced idleness. I recall that at the congressional hearings this phase of the plan evoked enormous derision and ridicule. It has since been modified so that recipients of the $200 monthly pension must be without other sources of income.

The McGroarty bill involves a decided change from the original Townsend plan. This bill now calls for a pension "not to exceed $200 per month." It is not an unequivocal $200 allotment. It may mean as much as $200 or as little as 50 cents. However, the followers of Townsend still believe they are to receive $200 and no less per month. This may involve an element of deception.

The Townsendites claim that the adoption of the plan would bring about the following: (1) A higher standard of living; (2) a withdrawal from gainful occupations of persons over 60, thus giving jobs to younger persons now unemployed; (3) a spending of an enormous sum of money, to wit, one billion six hundred millions per month by the aged pensioners, thus greatly expanding sales and bringing a rip-snorting, roaring prosperity.

The main objections to the plan, as visualized by economists worth their salt, and as was pointed out clearly by Henry Hazlitt in a recent issue of the New York Times, are as follows:

1. That the nature and burden of the proposed "transactions tax" would be ruinous;
2. That the plan would not "create purchasing power";
3. That it would not create jobs; and
4. That it proposes a grossly unjust redistribution of income.

The plan sounds simple enough, but upon examination it assumes ridiculous, staggering proportions. What will be its cost? In a word, the cost is literally frightening. Townsend believes that of the 10,300,000 persons 60 years of age or over, 8,000,000 will apply for pensions. At $2,400 per year the cost of putting the plan into effect would, therefore, be about nineteen billion two hundred million. The cost of administration would bring it up to about twenty billion—a rather tidy sum—a sum more than five times the total revenues of the Federal Government from all sources for the fiscal year of 1935. In fact, it is the equivalent of 40 percent of the entire income of the entire American people in the year 1934.

How is this cost of twenty billions to be raised? Townsend would inflict a burden of tax of 2 percent on "all business transactions."

Under the McGroarty bill "business transactions" include sales, exchanges of all kinds of property or interests therein, rents, interest charges, commissions, fees, rendering or performance of a service, railroad fares, telephone or other communication charges; practically every business action from the cradle to the grave. Townsend estimates that there are yearly $1,300,000,000,000 worth of such transactions. He has either drawn this figure out of thin air or bases it on an estimate of Dr. Goldenweiser of the Federal Reserve Board, who indicates that the Nation's bank debits in the year 1929 were about twelve hundred thirty billions. This is still short of Townsend's notion by seven hundred and seventy billions. However, concerning Dr. Goldenweiser's statement of bank debits in 1929, the same cannot be considered as embracing all business transactions, nor can they be considered divorced from the following facts: First, they cover the boom year, 1929; bank debits for 1934, for example, would be only four hundred and seventy billions, about 60 percent less in bank debits. Second, a tremendous part of these so-called bank debits represents bank loans renewed daily, and, therefore, such transactions are counted twice and even thrice. Many of the transactions are merely transfers between banks and between individuals and corporations. Much of it is merely bookkeeping technicalities.

A 2-percent tax on these business items would tend to bring about a tremendous reduction in the transactions themselves to avoid the tax, and therefore less business and less revenue would result, so that not enough money would be yielded for the first quarter's payments. People would seek to avoid the tax by limiting the number of these transactions. Let us follow some of these transactions thus taxed with the so-called 2-percent tax. If a man buys a Government bond, he would pay 2 percent. The yield on such a bond is only about 2¾ percent. When he sells the bond he would pay another 2 percent. The taxes on the purchase and sale would be 4 percent. The yield would be only 2¾ percent. He would thus lose at least 1¼ percent. He would refrain from buying Government bonds. This would be mighty serious. How could the Government float its bond issues? If it could not float its bond issues, how could we get the wherewithal to run the Government? Such a tax on security buying would drive most people away from the market. A financial or banking panic would result.

How would it affect the ordinary mortal? Let us take retail purchases. I want to buy a suit of clothes. I would have to pay a 2-percent tax on the retail cost; a 2-percent tax on the wholesale cost; a 2-percent tax on the jobbing cost; a 2-percent tax on the cost of the material to the clothing manufacturer; a 2-percent tax on the cost of the material to the textile mill; a 2-percent tax on transportation; a 2-percent tax on the raw wool, thread, lining, buttons; a 2-percent tax on all wages at the retail stage of production, transportation, and distribution; and a 2-percent tax on all incidental supplies. Such a pyramiding of tax and costs would be prohibitive. This would be inflation with a vengeance. Each of us would have to pay the 2-percent tax so often on each article, essentials and nonessentials, that our cost of living would be raised 50 percent. It has been estimated that out of every $150 we spend $50, or one-third, would have to go for taxes to pay twenty billions of Townsend pensions. The Townsend pensioners themselves would be penalized, so that out of the $200 they would supposedly get each month $67 would be turned back into taxes.

This pyramiding of tax would drive American production costs so high that in order to protect manufacturers against floods of foreign importations we would have to apply extortionately high tariffs. Otherwise there would be a complete surrender of the domestic markets to foreign imports. Such unbelievably high tariff walls on our part would encourage retaliatory tariffs on the part of all other countries. Our international trade would become frozen.

Furthermore, this pyramided 2-percent tax would make necessary the most gigantic policing bureaucracy in the history of the country—at what a prohibitive cost for the army of spies and snoopers. All pensioners must be policed. They must spend the $200 each month. If they fail to do so and obtain the next month's quota, they are guilty of a new crime, the crime of failure to spend money.

Additional purchasing power would not be created. The Townsendites claim that by paying out $20,000,000,000 yearly, each dollar would turn itself over at least 10 times, and there would result 200 billions of purchasing power on that much additional business. By virtue of such argument, which is utterly fallacious, the 34 billions; e. g., paid out in wages and salaries in 1934 should have produced 10 times that much, or 340 billions of business or purchasing power. But the total national income that year, which was the total purchasing power, was only 50 billions.

Thus the Townsend plan creates no new purchasing power. It would simply transfer or pump 20 billions of purchasing power from one group of people to another group—that is, from those persons under 60 years of age—involving nine-twentieths of the people, to all those persons over 60 years of age, involving about one-tenth.

Townsend says he would create additional jobs—but how? Let us assume that out of the 8,000,000 pensioners 4,000,000 shall have been gainfully employed. They would relinquish their jobs. These jobs would be taken by young persons. It is obvious, therefore, that no new jobs would be created. This is simply a substitution of one young job holder for an older job holder.

Let us pause over this a minute. What would happen in prosperous times when all jobs will be filled? This would mean a scaling down of job holders by 4,000,000. We would reduce workers to that extent. This would mean less production. This would mean less wealth for everyone.

Let us take another view of it. Townsend claims that the 8,000,000 pensioners would spend $2,400 per year. This, he says, would create a tremendous demand for goods, labor, and services. This is equivalent to saying that if there were fewer persons working and if those who do not work would spend more the country would be the richer.

As Walter Lippmann properly pointed out: "If that is so, then why stop with pensions of $2,400 for persons over 60? Why not $5,000 pensions for persons over 40? Or $10,000 pensions for persons over 30? What can be said against these proposals that must not be said against the Townsend plan?" * * * "If Dr. Townsend's medicine were a good remedy, the more people the country could find to support in idleness the better off it would be."

Income would be unjustly redistributed: In 1934 our national income was fifty billion. The payment of twenty billion under the Townsend plan to 8,000,000 persons would mean that less than 7 percent of the population of the country would receive 40 percent of its entire income. The other 93 percent, nonrecipients under the Townsend plan, would receive only 60 percent of the entire national income. The fallacy of the Townsend plan lies in its mistaking a shift in the distribution of national income or wealth for the creation of new wealth.

Furthermore, millionaires like Morgan, Rockefeller, Astor, and Gould would love such a tax as involved in the Townsend plan. That 2-percent tax would affect least of all large concentrations of wealth, but would fall heaviest on the poor.

It is interesting to speculate as to how old persons over 60 would spend $200 per month or, $2,400 per year. They would become the prey of money sharks, the dupes of sponsors of crackpot get-rich-quick schemes, and their names would be on every sucker list. Let us assume an old couple, living in the country, receives $400 a month to spend—$100 per week (they must spend it!)—what could they or would they buy? Their necessities, ordinarily modest, would not absorb $100 per week. Their first thought would be to buy an automobile. So many old people would be buying automobiles that the car ordinarily priced at $400 would immediately jump in price to $1,500 or more. Meanwhile your income and mine has remained stationary. That car would be beyond our reach.

I can well imagine old couples would keep in idleness many sons and daughters and in-laws. Spinsters over 60 would again become marriageable. Gigolos and roustabouts would wait in line to propose. Old men will again become attractive to designing young minxes. Having exhausted their list of purchases, they would have to fall back on buying lots in Painted Post, while some old ladies, in order to exhaust their $2,400 per year, might have to purchase imported French perfumes.

There is real evil in the ambitious and selfish people who capitalize the hopes and fears of the aged.

The pity of it all is the false promise the Townsend plan holds out to the old, feeble, and helpless. It is hard to tell the poor aged that the scheme is merely a mirage. Everywhere they dream of riches to come. Nothing could be more tragic than their eventual disillusionment.

I was curious to know what economists abroad thought of this plan. There is unanimity of opinion that the plan is hopeless. Permit me to quote briefly from the English magazine, the Fortnightly, an excerpt from an article by S. K. Radcliffe, an Englishman:

"The endowment of some millions of old people who have never handled money would be an economic earthquake; that $200 is a definite sum in relation to the present value of the dollar, but would be anything or nothing in the second month of the Townsend era; that his 2-percent tax would fall upon people of small means, could not be administered, and would not yield money for the first quarter's payments; that, in a word, this is an adventure in Cloud-Cuckoo-Land."

Personally I am heartily in favor of sensible and adequate pensions for old people. This is embodied in our social-security bill of last year. In New York State we provide pensions for our aged and many other States do likewise. In the course of time national and State legislation will be greatly improved and more sensible benefits will be granted to the aged, helpless, and needy. The Townsend scheme would destroy at one fell swoop all progress made in old-age-pension laws. It should be consigned to the place where it belongs—limbo.

America is on the march, says my colleague, Mr. MAIN. I answer, leave it so. With Townsend it would be in retreat.

THE FOURTH ESTATE (PRESS) AND THE FIFTH ESTATE (RADIO), SO-CALLED

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I received permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD to include an address by Radio Commissioner Payne. Since that time I have secured an estimate, and I now renew my request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Hon. George Henry Payne, Federal Communications Commissioner, at Columbia University School of Journalism, October 31, 1935:

Every journalist who views his profession seriously must well consider the whole matter of radio—including its regulation by the Government and its control by private capital, and the character of its programs—as these affect the great mass of the people. A new and fascinating problem is here presented to the journalist, the solution of which has been somewhat obscured by the hokum of professional ballyhoo.

The novelty of the whole problem and the sudden origin of radio, with broadcasting in the hands of a few far-seeing and able individuals, have led to difficulties in discussing impartially and dispassionately just what are the rights of those who showed enterprise, industry, and audacity in building up the new art, as well as the rights of the public, largely inarticulate, except through the voices of educators and a few groups that have tried to represent the aspiration for a more cultural output and one less tinctured with pure commercialism.

The journalist has an interest in this problem as great as any and greater than many.

The people of the future—and I do not mean generations from now, but those even of the years immediately following—are going to have to consider more and more the entire question of radio—its effect on the millions, its influence in formulating the thought, taste, aspirations, and destiny of the people of the country who turn to it hourly because of its novelty, and who may be affected beneficially or to the detriment of themselves and their government.

Therefore, while there are many aspects of the Federal Communications Commission that I should like to talk about today, I believe I should speak of the one most vital at this time to your profession. You have, of course, a professional interest in our work in the matter of the pending investigation of the telephone industry. That is of interest not only to you but to every telephone user. There is a distinct journalistic side to the recent accomplishment of a new radiotelephone channel to France, and sometime when I can do so diplomatically I shall have some possibly interesting statements to make as to that.

When it comes to the work of the Telegraph Division of the Federal Communications Commission, I might discuss with propriety the proposed merger of the wire lines, a problem which has a bearing on the journalistic profession, as have the questions of rates, press rates, competition, etc. Today, however, it seems to me the most interesting problem is the radio.

Now, in order to understand the attitude of journalism toward the progress of civilization, and what is currently regarded as democracy, it becomes necessary to review certain facts with which you, as students of journalism, are doubtless familiar.

Not the least of the interesting phases of journalistic development have been those periods when its protagonists have lost faith in its origin. It is not impossible that this lack of faith in its very humble beginnings and its struggle to survive as against autocracy and Toryism were largely due to ignoring the details of journalistic beginnings.

It was the Tories, the Conservatives, in history who were always fighting against a free press; it was the Whigs, Liberals, Progressives, who were always fighting for it.

The English have a saying that if you want to make a Conservative out of a Liberal or a Laborite, get him to dinner and then put him beside a duchess. The power of high-sounding titles to change men's fundamental beliefs—and even their natures—has, in this country, waned considerably in recent years, even in New York.

The great financier or the great industrialist in our country takes the place of the great duchess in England. The fact that the newspaper has become a large business venture has led many to assume that the interests of business and journalism are identical. They are not.

Journalism in this country began with the struggle on the part of those without political power to obtain the right to express their objections against unjust and tyrannical government and to voice their appeal for consideration of their rights as human beings.

The history of journalism in America cannot be separated from the development of the democratic idea. The very first editor in this country, the forgotten and neglected Benjamin Harris, in all his interesting struggles represented that idea, for his fight was for freedom of expression, the very essence of democracy. With us, democracy has come to mean sovereignty of the whole body of the people. The achievement of that sovereignty was of the slowest development, and frequently the battle was made nowhere else than in the meager and forgotten journals.

To journalism, then, democracy owes not only its strength but, in whole or in part, all of its important victories. No political advance has been made in this country without the aid of the press; all of our democratic achievements have been accomplished with the help of men who were in the beginning regarded as mere mechanics, poor printers, or who were, in later periods, grudgingly given credit and political recognition as the representatives of a not entirely welcome social and political phenomenon.

Journalism, in turn, owes to democracy its enjoyment of enormous privileges, its practical admission into the Government through the medium of public opinion. In the preliminary skirmishes for liberty in this country the people found that the free press was a powerful weapon by which they were able to wrest from tyranny the power of government. They found that through the press they could keep their own phalanxes compact—a difficult task in a country spread over the great area of the Thirteen Colonies.

"A free press" became their shibboleth. When the Nation was born and the political thought of the philosophers of the eighteenth century had taken root, it was the press that made the battle for the extension of the suffrage and that wrested from the minority the power which, in a democracy, must be with the people. Later the abolition movement, variously explained, was a development of the democratic idea. What many of the statesmen of the pre-Civil War time failed to realize was that there could not exist in a democracy a class, such as the slaveholders, claiming to have property rights in human beings. The press that took up the cause of the Negroes did not represent the black men alone; it was impelled to action by the moral sense of those who had recently achieved sovereignty and who, subconsciously perhaps, acted as much for their own protection as for the betterment of the blacks. The low condition to which the poor whites were sinking in the South shows that a condition worse than slavery was possible, if the right to own human beings was not abolished.

Thus the development of democracy meant the increase of the power of journalism. Strange and crude in the beginning were the instruments of this journalism, it is true, but elegance and refinement are characteristics neither of biologic nor social evolution. The manners of men are rude, and as journalism developed—as a more or less illegitimate or "poor white" brother of literature—it was subjected, helpfully in most cases, it is true, to criticism either by those who had little interest in its political significance or by those who were politically and socially opposed to the purposes to be achieved.

THE BEGINNINGS OF JOURNALISM IN THE COLONIES

It was not until 1639 that the first printing press was imported into this country. A second printing press was brought over in 1660. Two years later, with only two presses in the Colony, the government of Massachusetts, following the example of the mother country, appointed a licensor of the press, and in 1664 a law was passed permitting printing only in Cambridge, and then only by those licensed.

In the time elapsing between the sailing of the Mayflower and the establishment of the censorship, a little more than 40 years, the folks in the Colonies had been hearing of strange happenings at home. Journalism in England had been born. The first newspaper, the Weekly Newes, had appeared, but at a time when authors, printers, and importers of prohibited books were being subjected to the most barbarous persecutions—treatment that recalled to the Pilgrims the conditions that had driven them to Holland.

Despite all persecutions, the fight in England was on in bitter earnest. More than 30,000 political pamphlets and newspapers were issued between 1640 and the Restoration, 2,000 bound volumes of which are now to be found in the British Museum.

On September 25, 1690, Publick Occurences, the first newspaper to be printed on this continent, was published by Benjamin Harris from his "London Coffee House", the printing having been done for him by Richard Pierce.

The first issue was printed on three pages of a folded sheet, leaving the last page blank, there being two columns to a page, each page being about 11 by 7 inches.

Harris begins by declaring that his purpose is to furnish the country once a month with an account of "such considerable things as have arrived unto our notice", a promise calculated to arouse the interest of the dwellers in the wilderness, who must have been hungry for news of their fellow men. He promises that he will take pains to collect his news and will "particularly make himself beholden to such persons in Boston whom he knows to have been for their own use the diligent observers of such matters."

Thirdly, he states, "that something may be done toward curing, or at least the charming, of that spirit of lying which prevails among us; wherefore, nothing shall be entered but what we have reason to believe is true, repairing to the best fountains for our information", etc.

Stout old Benjamin Harris, fine old Whig—even in the wilderness he was on the side of humanity and progress to the very great displeasure of the authorities. Two days after publication, Judge Sewall noted in his diary that the paper had appeared and that it had given "much distaste" because it was not licensed and because of the "passages referring to the French King and the Maquas." Four days later the legislative authorities took the matter up officially, sagely ruling that it contained "reflections of a very high nature", and strictly forbade "anything in print without license first obtained from those appointed by the Government to grant the same."

On August 7, 1721, James Franklin issued the first number of the New England Courant.

This paper continued in its course, criticizing and occasionally referring with sarcasm to the Government, until the general court took the matter in hand. A committee was appointed to consider the charges, and it finally decided, on the issue of January 14, 1722, that the tendency of the paper was to mock religion and government, and that, therefore, James Franklin should be forbidden to print and publish his paper or any other paper or pamphlet like it unless what was to be printed was first submitted to the secretary of the Province. It was on this paper that Benjamin Franklin began his journalistic career.

From these small beginnings in a short period of 44 years a new institution developed into an actual power—the beginning of the development of what Burke later declared in the House of Commons was the Fourth Estate. Like so many other institutions of civilization and progress, it apparently prospered in adversity; it fed on the oppression that would have annihilated it.

From now on the history of journalism is not of its own struggles but of the struggles of the ideas for which it stands. The institution itself is established. Henceforth it is a story of development; development in close connection with the idea of democracy, from which it sprang, to whose influence it owed its quick growth, and to which, in turn, it contributed as no other single factor in civilization, except Christianity, has contributed.

Politically and economically the Colonies were preparing for a change. They were no longer the separate settlements in which the advent of the first printer was an historic advance, nor yet were the groping imitators of conditions at home, where the publication of a newspaper was a revolutionary breaking away from the foundations of government. In the time that a bare half dozen papers had been established the colonists had accomplished a complete volte face. Instead of looking to England for complete guidance, there was, as Andrew Hamilton expressed it, a resentment at the continuous citation of English authority. In Hamilton's speech at the Zenger trial we find the idea cogently put forth—for the first time, I believe—that if the law of the mother country is wrong, the duty of the colonists is to correct it.

With such a start in so brief a time, it was but a step to a declaration of complete independence. But as a stepping stone to such a declaration there was necessary a feeling of nationality. This new institution did much to develop that feeling.

The beginning of the national spirit is in fact almost coincident with that of journalism.

The first number of the New York Weekly Journal appeared under the auspices of John Peter Zenger on November 15, 1733. In this very first issue there was an article on the liberty of the press, which was used as the text for many others, all filled with direct allusions to Governor Cosby, of New York, and his arrogant conduct. As a direct result, Zenger was arrested on a charge of libel.

When this famous case finally came to trial, Andrew Hamilton, the celebrated lawyer of Philadelphia—the ablest attorney in the Colonies and a warm personal friend of Benjamin Franklin—walked into court to defend Zenger. It is unnecessary to recite the details of this case, but it will be remembered that it represents a landmark in the struggle of a free press against censorship in this country. The victory of Zenger and Hamilton was a victory of the people.

When the 10 original amendments of the Constitution were declared in force on December 15, 1791, constituting what is known as the Bill of Rights, a free press was guaranteed to the people of this country, and since that time there have been practically no infringements of this guaranty except on the rarest occasions in war time.

In that connection it was on May 18, 1864, the World and the Journal of Commerce printed the bogus proclamation of Joseph Howard, Jr. Both papers were immediately suspended and not allowed to resume until Monday, May 23.

THE PRESS AND RADIO

Those who would compare the newspaper and the radio must consider impartially the position of radio and its problems and the political and economic position of the press.

The journalist who establishes a paper becomes a capitalist with an investment in a machine to print with, paper to print on, and the labor to bring out his paper. He uses nothing that belongs to other people.

The theory that he should be licensed, controlled, curbed, or regulated on the ground that he might be a corrupting and disturbing disseminator of false ideas and opinions has long ago vanished, and freedom has become established firmly in our policy and in that of other democratic communities.

The only restriction on the journalist is that of the law—statutory and common. He shall not commit libel with immunity from the law, which from the days of Andrew Hamilton and the Zenger trial has been so amended and construed that the broadest and most liberal interpretation must be made in libel suits.[1]

He cannot print indecent statements, because they violate statutory laws, and he cannot propagate advertisements or reading matter tending to promote illegal or illicit acts, etc.

If he commits offenses against good taste or violates other canons that are not specifically indictable, he must suffer at the hands of the public in the impaired value of his capital investment, and the disapproval of the community to whom he appeals for support. He does not and must not suffer at the hands of the Government.

Journalism has its defects; not infrequently its errors have been manifested. As one of the three persons who, in the last 50 years, have undertaken the unprofitable task of writing a history of American journalism, I feel I can speak on that subject with a certain amount of authority.

Whatever the defects and whatever the errors have been, they are the defects and the errors identical, almost, with those of a people endeavoring to develop popular institutions and to control their own government.

The horror with which the so-called upper classes viewed the introduction of the penny press in the early forties was the outcome of the natural protest of a superior social class, conscious of its caste, rebelling against the rise to power and social recognition of what were then described as the lower orders.

To interest the lower orders of "mechanics", as they were then sometimes referred to, it was necessary for the penny press to print matters that dealt with the life of the mechanic or laboring class, and to those who had more or less controlled journalism up to that time, this was an evidence of the vulgar decadence of American journalism.

That the leaders in this decadence were James Gordon Bennett, the elder, Benjamin H. Day, the founder of the New York Sun, and Horace Greeley, is evidence of the fact that in the disdain and contempt for the vulgar publications, appealing to the vulgar masses, the critics of this innovation lost track of the political significance of the social and journalistic revolution that had taken place.

PART II. RADIO

Thus we see that there has ever been in the history of journalism an interest in the public welfare and in the development and protection of democracy. It is this interest and the record of its accomplishments that account for the privileges that the "fourth estate" enjoys, for the fact that it is protected by the Constitution, and for the fact that the public has been ever alive to see that there is no curtailment of the rights and the privileges of the press.

This has been true despite the fact that journalism is a private enterprise, capitalized by individuals who pass on to the public no share of their financial profits, the public being quite content to receive in return for its support the benefits of developed news agencies, improved mechanical processes, and loyalty to the institutions of democracy. The large fortunes that have been made by individuals in journalism have rarely, if ever, been criticized as unearned. On the contrary, the American people have had a pride in the accomplishments of its great journals and journalists and have not only trusted them and followed them but voluntarily given them increased power and prestige.

Now, what is the public interest along similar lines in the matter of the radio?

Radio is a development in electrical science.

The existence of electromagnetic waves, by means of which radio broadcasting is accomplished, was predicted mathematically by Clerk Maxwell in 1864 and again in 1873. Practical experiments with these waves were first made by Heinrich Hertz in 1888, who showed that they were propagated through space in the same manner as waves of light.

The practicability of utilizing radio waves for communication was first demonstrated by Marconi in 1895, basing his work on the inventions and discoveries of numerous scientists, beginning with Savory in 1827 to his own time. Marconi used these waves at that time for signaling over distances of about 1 mile. As a result of Marconi's work the first commercial radiotelegraph company was established in 1897.

The first applications of radio to communication for commercial purposes were made by the maritime services. Until about the year 1922 nearly all ship and shore communication was conducted by spark transmitters operating on frequencies between 500 and 1,000 kilocycles.

The first experiments in broadcasting were made as early as the year 1916, after the invention of the vacuum tube by De Forest. These experiments led to the establishment of the first broadcasting stations in 1921, among the first being stations KDKA, East Pittsburgh, Pa., and WWJ, of the Detroit News. Many of the first broadcasting stations operating in about the year 1922 were owned by radio dealers or radio manufacturers. It was not long, however, before newspapers, educational and religious institutions, and department stores became interested, and consequently became owners of broadcasting stations.

The first interconnection of broadcasting stations by telephone wires for the simultaneous broadcasting of programs—forerunner of our chain networks of today—was made between stations in New York and Chicago in 1922. From this time on developments were so rapid that at the end of 4 years there were 550 stations operating in the United States, and the sale of radio apparatus had increased from a million dollars a year to a million dollars a day, over 200,000 men being employed in the industry.

Other high lights in the early history of broadcasting were the widening of the broadcast band to the frequencies from 550 to 1,500 kilocycles, and the provision thereby of 96 channels; the "wave jumping" episode, after the Fourth National Radio Conference in 1925, and the defeat of the Department of Commerce in the courts on the question of its authority to deny licenses and to enforce its frequency assignments, resulting finally in the enactment of the Radio Act of 1927 and the creation of the Federal Radio Commission. In 1934 came the Federal Communications Act of that year with the creation of the Federal Communications Commission.

The Federal Communications Commission has been established now 16 months. In that time it has had to meet many serious problems. One of the gravest of these has been the rising tide of criticism against the character of many of the programs on the air and the inability of those interested in cultural and educational programs to have any effect on the general situation. What I considered a most harmless speech at Cornell University last August was immediately seized on as an attack on the commercial interests. Far from having an animus in the matter, I had felt at the time that I was really making a contribution in their behalf by pointing out the danger of not meeting the criticisms of the educational forces. To show that this danger was a substantial one, I quoted from Mr. S. Howard Evans' very able report to Senator WHEELER on the broadcasting situation, a report that not only reviews the whole situation most severely but suggests reforms of a most drastic nature. In that address and in a previous one at Harvard I quoted Senator WHEELER's biting condemnation of the character of the programs that he himself was obliged to listen to, thereby indicating that the criticism of broadcasting came not only from college professors and other educators throughout the country, but from those who were in a position of power that would permit them to remedy those situations by legislation.

In all fairness to the actual leaders in broadcasting, I must say that no word of criticism came from them, but from the subordinates there was an amusing outburst at the idea that a Federal Communications Commissioner should assume to have any thoughts on the subject of reform.

I will not assume to talk for my colleagues, but for myself I will admit that I was astonished to find that there was such a misunderstanding as to what was going on in the public mind as to the attitude of the radio industry toward the public. That this misunderstanding was as much due to the old Radio Commission as to the industry itself is without question. Having gotten into the frame of mind that anything was acceptable to the public if it was accepted by the old Radio Commission, the broadcast industry seemed to have assumed that all they had to do, in view of the new and drastic law and the changed personnel, was to treat the new personnel as they had treated the old Commission and everything would be "jake."

To show how grievous was this mistake, let me quote from Mr. Evans' report to Senator WHEELER the very sharp statements that refer to the old conditions and the threatening attitude assumed toward the new Commission if it continues to follow in the footsteps of its predecessors.

"Somehow the Communications Commission has to accept responsibility for the kind of programs broadcast over stations which the Commission has in granting their licenses certified to be operating in the public interest. If the Commission cannot exercise this control through the requirement of standards, some other method must be found * * *.

"The big difficulty in getting our broadcasting system put upon a solid foundation is the fact that to date the Commission has refused to use boldly the authority with which it is vested by law. There has been the tendency to avoid criticism rather than to correct broadcasting * * *.

"Out of 40 frequencies set aside by the Commission for clear-channel service, 24 have as their dominant licensees stations which are affiliated with the National Broadcasting Co., 11 have as their dominant licensees stations affiliated with the Columbia Broadcasting System, and only 5 have independent stations as their chief licensees. All the high-power regional stations are affiliated with one or another of these two chains * * *.

"Advertisers are interested in selling goods and want entertainment only as it creates an audience to which they can address their patter. In some parts of the country, especially on small stations, they want no entertainment at all, insisting on the right to dish out direct sales talk and to quote prices * * *."

Now, it being granted that the radio does not fulfill the ideal we might expect, we must in all fairness present the other side of the picture.

This country is not inclined to accept the British system, where the radio is completely controlled by the Government, where no advertisements are permitted, and where the programs are supported by a tax on the radio sets.

Aside from the fear of political propaganda if we should have a Government-owned broadcasting system, we have the fact that under our system the commercial broadcasters have shown considerable energy and even at times imagination, and have produced some very able programs.

The American public is a generous public, a little childish at times in its delight over novelties, as one learns when one travels in Europe and sees one's countrymen in touring bodies making shrill sounds of delight over some ancient cathedral or architectural wonder; but whatever childish qualities they have, they are the qualities of the heart. They are willing to give credit where credit is due and to see that the other fellow gets the proper return for his labor, his ingenuity, and his inventions.

As I have said, I do not believe that our people would tolerate the British system, and with all the faults of the present system they would be loath to change it lest they do an injustice to those who are pioneers in the field.

But just as the American public is generous and almost childish in its appreciation of those who appeal to it, it can become angry when aroused, and the record of our people is that when they think they have been abused they are swift to punish.

If there is evident on the part of the broadcasters an intention to increase the educational and cultural qualities of the programs, if there is observable a desire to reform the advertising methods and inundations with which the public is afflicted, the present system will be maintained, I believe.

On the other hand, if there is an arrogant assumption of political power, if there is, instead of reform, increased lobbying activity, the indignation that now is unspoken, except by educators and publicists, will spread.

Now, when we come to the question of the political status of radio, it would not be necessary to go into any discussion of the subject were it not that the idea has been advanced that it is an independent political estate. The advocates of commercial broadcasting have gone so far as to declare that they constitute a "fifth estate"—a new political power in our Government.

The mistaken idea of a fifth estate would not be important were we not living in an age, due partly to the radio, where terms and nomenclature make the thought and ideation of so many people and where a wrong idea travels as fast as a right idea—again partly due to the radio; and where the wrong idea can be as easily fixed in the minds of the people as can the other.

The politics of our time is redolent with similar confusion. The etymological confusion on the part of the group that call themselves "grass rooters", denouncing another group as "radicals", is only equaled by the confusion of that historic gentleman—it is pleasant to remember his name, Sir Boyle Roche—who rose in Parliament and said:

"Mr. Speaker, I smell a rat; I see him brewing in the air; but, mark me, I shall yet nip him in the bud."

The suggestion to create a fifth estate of the radio broadcasters would, in view of its ignorance of our political and social development, be trivial if it were not for the fact that simultaneously with this suggestion there is in progress an obvious, practical, pragmatic endeavor on the part of those controlling commercial broadcasters to make the Federal Communications Commission a subservient instrument to commercial radio.

I realize that this is a very broad statement to make, but it is one that is borne out by the facts, and one that, at some other time, more appropriate and less crowded, I shall justify in detail.

I have respect for the heads of the large commercial concerns, but I cannot help feeling they are allowing their subordinates more latitude than is justified by these subordinates' judgment, knowledge, and experience in the difficult art of popular government.

It would at first blush seem unnecessary to go into the origin of these "estates" were not the misleading idea so broadly sown. Only the other day the distinguished editor of the Shreveport (La.) Journal asked:

"Evidently the gentleman" (meaning myself) "accepts the general definition of the press, although we have our doubts as to his ability to explain why it is so called or what constitutes the other three estates."

The fact and the very nomenclature of the estates grew out of the politicotheistic conception of the state.

The politico-theistic conception of the state of the medieval ages goes back to the ancient world, where the king not only had divine rights but was himself a divinity, or at least God's anointed. The king was the state. As Louis XIV said, "L'etat, c'est moi." It was a development politically and progress toward more representative government when the two estates, first, the clergy, and then the nobility, were recognized as having rights in government after the Lord's anointed.

The third estate rose first in France, but the movement was almost concurrent in England, where the Magna Carta (1215) "had sought to establish the supremacy of the aristocracy over the king", but really led to the establishment of the third estate and the development of governmental power in the middle class.

To quote from Jeremy Bentham:

"Anno 1265 the man by whom the first germ was planted was Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester, a foreigner and a rebel. In this first call to the people there was no better nor steadier design than that of obtaining monetary support for rebellion. The practice of seeing and hearing deputies from the lower orders before money was attempted to be taken out of their pockets, having thus sprung up, in the next reign Edward the First saw his convenience in conforming to it.

"Henry the Sixth's was the first reign in which the commons had really a part in legislation. Till then they had no part in penning of any laws." [2]

The rise of the third estate in Europe definitely commenced about the middle of the eleventh century in those southern cities of France which, because of their proximity to Italy, maintained throughout the medieval ages some of the old Roman spirit of freedom and in some cases some of the old Roman culture.

The Teutonic invasion had brought into France the barons and overlords, and it was against these that the municipalities had to fight in order to maintain their freedom when the barons and the church had succeeded in reducing the power of the King.

Following the Merovingians there developed a King with real power, and to him the citizens of the cities appealed for protection against the feudal barons. It was to his interest to see that the citizens—the third estate—did have freedom and become a political and social power in order that he could use them to keep down the barons and the clerics constituting the first and second estates.

So it was that the bourgeoisie of the cities who, not because they wanted political power but because they wanted protection against the oppression of the second estate, made the beginnings of the third estate, the commonalty, the House of Commons, as it was called later in England, and eventually the government "of, by, and for the people" of the United States.

I have reviewed the rise of the press, the fourth estate, as Burke called it for the first time, when he said, according to Carlyle, that there were three estates in Parliament, "but in the reporters' gallery there sat a fourth estate, more important far than they all."

Now, then, what are the differences between this fourth estate of Burke and the fifth estate of the commercial broadcasting propagandists?

If a person has grievances that he thinks should be communicated to the public, he is at liberty, if he possesses the resources, to publish a paper anywhere in the country, even in the smallest hamlet, in order to disseminate his views. A similar course is absolutely impossible in the case of radio broadcasting. There are only 90 channels in this country over which broadcasting may be done. On these channels there are altogether 629 broadcasting stations, the great majority of which are limited in power and range, reaching only the people within a comparatively short distance from the stations. As it is, from an engineering point of view, this country already has a great many more stations than good service justifies. It is plain that a person cannot open a station of his own in the same manner that he can publish a newspaper of his own in order to communicate his views, no matter how valid and necessary the information which he wishes to convey to the public may be. Nature has limited the number of waves that can be used for broadcasting. Nature has placed practically no limit upon the number of newspapers that can be published.

It is interesting to note that there are only 26 broadcasting stations in Germany, 25 in France, 15 in Great Britain, 15 in Italy, and that the entire of Europe (parts of Asia included) has only 357 stations, but that even this small number of stations, qualified engineers say, is far in excess of the number that may be operated without interference.

The technical restrictions on radio affect its application so greatly that it is a radically different instrument from the newspaper, and it must be rated by a different set of values.

I have discussed this problem with one thought in mind—the upholding and development of our democracy. Despite the various doubters—the exponents of fascism on one hand, and the advocates of communism on the other hand—our democracy will, I believe, go thrivingly on its way, not because of the inherent virtue or ability of our people, which I am not inclined here at this time to deny or assert, but because at the crucial moment in our national development we took the course that was in accord with the highest principle of political evolution and modern ethics—the rule that governments must tend toward the greatest good for the greatest number, the belief that "a government holds power only by its capacity to serve the people's needs." [3]

No step in that development was more important than the doctrine of a free press. It will survive; and as long as it does, there will survive a free democracy.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1937

Mr. WOODRUM, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 9863, Rept. No. 1909) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes, which was read the first and second time, and, together with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered printed.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH reserved all points of order on the bill.

THE DECISION OF 1936

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include a radio address delivered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MARSHALL].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address by Hon. L. T. MARSHALL, of Ohio, from Washington, D. C., January 6, 1936:

The year 1936 is before us. For 2 years and 10 months the Government of our Nation has been under the unprecedented control of the administration in power in Washington. This year, 1936, will be a most eventful year in the history of our country.

In only a few months our citizens will at the ballot box give expression of either approval or disapproval of the policies of the present administration. Never before has there been such interest as is now manifested by an aroused people. The decision to be rendered this fall will be one of the most important and far-reaching decisions ever made by the American people. It will determine whether or not our Government is to continue as it has for a century and a half as a government of the people, by the people, and for the people. This decision will determine whether representative government under the Constitution will be preserved and passed on as a heritage to our children, or there shall be substituted in its stead a government of men rather than of law, with all power centered in the Federal Government at Washington, to be administered by a few bureaucrats, none of whom will be chosen by the people whom they assume to rule.

If our forefathers, those patriots who met in Philadelphia in 1787 and after months of striving brought forth our Constitution, giving to us a form of government that has been the envy of all the rest of the world, were to come back to earth, they would be shocked to witness the vicious onslaught on their handiwork by this present administration.

One cannot express the humiliation that would be theirs to observe the misuse of the taxing power given to Congress by the Constitution, not to raise revenue, but to control the amount of cotton and tobacco that may be sold by the farmers of our land, by the levying of a tax of one-half the selling price on all in excess of the quota assigned each farmer. The final blow to them would be to learn that by the misuse of this same power we now have a law carrying a penalty of fine and imprisonment for both the buyer and seller of the lowly "spud" unless sold in a Government-prescribed container and bearing a stamp as evidence that this transaction is within the law. The tax under this law is 45 cents a bushel. This measure affecting the economic welfare of every household in America was forced through the House of Representatives with just 1 hour of debate. In the light of the decision of the Supreme Court this afternoon these measures will be invalidated.

The abiding fear in the minds of the citizens at the time of the adoption of our Constitution was that too much authority had been given to the Federal Government, and as a result the 10 amendments now known as the Bill of Rights were submitted by the First Congress and promptly ratified by the States. Therein is guaranteed to the most humble citizen his security of both person and property. The tenth amendment reserves to each State and the citizens thereof every authority not specifically granted to the Congress. I wonder what the framers of our Government would think of the present centralization of power in Washington?

The sponsors of the New Deal would give to Congress unlimited authority to legislate on any and all subjects but in the manner they choose. My observation of Congress, both before and since becoming a Member, leads me to believe that the rights of the individual are only safe under the protection of the Constitution rather than at the hands of an ever changing Congress.

There is now pending in Congress a resolution to amend the Constitution by granting almost unlimited power to Congress to legislate on all subjects and to regulate the everyday activity of our citizens. Men and women of America, it is time to be aroused on this question. It was Hitler who said that "through propaganda a people can be made to believe * * * the most miserable existence is a paradise."

If there is anything for which this administration is outstanding, it is for the extent of its propaganda. Almost every department of Government is infested with high-salaried and able writers who have been called in from private enterprise and whose sole job is to sell the socialistic activities of this administration to citizens of the country under the promise of a more abundant life.

No administration ever had as fair a chance or so nearly unanimous and whole-hearted cooperation on every hand as did the present one for many months following March 4, 1933. The men and women of America in all walks of life were charmed with the pleasing personality of the one whom they had chosen for their leader. They accepted his promises at face value as he declared at Chicago he accepted the platform just adopted 100 percent. Little did an unsuspecting and trustful people then know what was in store for them. How many of them who gave him their full confidence would have supported him had they known what his program was to be? He spoke in glowing terms and convincing manner of the New Deal. We did not know the New Deal meant the adoption and writing into law of 12 planks of the Socialist platform and the repudiation of all but one of the planks in the platform to which he so solemnly and apparently sincerely pledged allegiance in his acceptance speech at Chicago.

We did not know when he promised to cut the operating expense of Government 25 percent that he was going to launch this country on the greatest spending spree ever witnessed by any nation in time of peace. We did not know that he would inveigle a rubber-stamp New-Deal Congress into appropriating as much money within a period of two and a half years as was spent by all administrations from George Washington to Woodrow Wilson.

The President seems to meet the criticism of this vast debt that has been and is being piled higher and higher in his usual jovial and jesting manner. In his recent speech at Atlanta he stated that he was informed early in his administration by bankers that our country could stand an indebtedness of $70,000,000,000, but the search for these bankers goes merrily on. If the President is not alarmed by the magnitude of our debt, the same cannot be said of the taxpayers of the country. Who is the taxpayer? Every one of you who is listening in tonight, and each and every other person in the United States whether or not he or she owns any taxable property. Taxes are reflected in and add to the cost of each and every article you buy, whether it be food, raiment, or shelter, or whatever it may be. It has been pointed out that from the time the wheat is harvested, in its journey from the field to the table in the home in the form of bread, there have been collected some 53 different taxes, all of which contribute to the final cost thereof. The laborer, out of his weekly wage, contributes about one-fifth of his pay to the cost of Government. With just so much money to spend as you increase the amount that goes to taxes, you in direct proportion reduce the amount of merchandise bought. It is thus self-evident that increased taxes mean smaller consumption resulting in lessened business activity and fewer jobs, increased unemployment, and more people on relief, which in turn means more taxes. A continuation of such a program simply leads from bad to worse. I do not wish to be understood as opposed to relief, but the manner in which relief has been administered has more than doubled the necessary cost. It seems that this administration under the guidance of the master politician of Tammany fame could not resist the opportunity to perpetuate itself in office by building a vast political organization to furnish relief direct from Washington. It is needless to point out to you the waste and extravagance of this program that is observed by all on every hand.

Projects involving the expenditure of millions are apparent in many places, many of which projects are not dictated by good judgment and which can be of no lasting benefit. The problem of unemployment is a most serious one and will require in its solution all the initiative of private industry with the help of a friendly Government. Yet we observe this administration seeking to stir up public prejudice against business. They would have you believe all private industry is crooked, apparently paving the way to supplant it with Government owned and operated enterprise, thus creating more bureaus and more taxes to support them. This threatening attitude by the administration has retarded recovery.

We did not know that legislation vitally affecting all business activity in our country and the mode of life of the individual citizen would be written in advance of the session of the Congress by a group of smart college intellectuals without any practical experience and who know not what it means to earn a dollar by the sweat of their brow. And that this legislation would be forced by the power of the Chief Executive through a subservient Congress of "yes men", with little or no consideration either in committee or on the floor of the Congress, with the minority party thwarted by a gag rule which prevented even the offering of an amendment.

The President frankly stated that much of his program was experimental and that he would be the first to admit its failure, and yet we observe the following: After the National Recovery Act had proved itself a failure in the calm judgment of a large majority of our citizens and the codes written under its authority had become repulsive to liberty-loving Americans (as, for example, the arrest of a tailor for charging 5 cents less than the price fixed by the code for pressing a pair of pants), and after the Supreme Court by unanimous decision had held the act unconstitutional, the President said this decision took us back to the horse-and-buggy days. None of the dire things predicted by the President following this decision have happened. On the other hand, this decision has proved the most beneficial event since the inauguration of the New Deal. It was notice to the world that one branch of our Government still functions on its own power. It gave to businessmen that spark of courage to believe that they still have some protection from the restrictive and punitive legislation that has retarded recovery under this administration. As a result private industry has gone forward and business has shown an improvement.

There are those in high places in this administration who advocate taking from the Supreme Court the authority to pass upon the constitutionality of a law passed by the Congress. When this condition comes to pass, the President can force through a spineless Congress such legislation as he desires, with the result that we have set up a complete and perfect dictatorship in America comparable to that in Italy, Germany, and Russia.

In the early days of this administration few dared to publicly criticize or point out the unsoundness of many of its policies. To do so was branded as unpatriotic. Sufficient time has now elapsed for the people to understand the program and to know where it is leading us. It has been weighed and found wanting. It has failed to stand up under the calm judgment of the American people. It has failed not because of propaganda against it but in spite of all the propaganda in its behalf from the pen of the best propagandists paid with the taxpayers' money. This propaganda is broadcasted throughout the Nation by the use of the United States mail, also at the taxpayers' expense. Every test of public opinion now shows an overwhelming trend away from the New Deal, including the poll now being taken by the Literary Digest. Supporters of the administration would like to discount the accuracy of the poll, but I well remember that the poll taken by this magazine in 1934, which showed the President's continued popularity, received their hearty applause. The latest report is that an attempt will be made in the present session to bar these ballots from the mails.

I have refrained from any criticism of the Democratic Party in this discussion for the reason that the administration in power is not a Democratic administration, and thousands of patriotic, liberty-loving Democrats will join with us in a decision to restore representative government in America.

THE SUPREME COURT AND THE A. A. A.

Mr. HILDEBRANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the Supreme Court and the A. A. A.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILDEBRANDT. Mr. Speaker, again it has been demonstrated beyond cavil or question that the Supreme Court of the United States is the last bulwark of reaction.

If there were any who cherished the hope that the high tribunal might change the current conception of its reactionary character by an occasional decision friendly to social-welfare legislation, their illusions must have been completely shattered by the ruling regarding the Agricultural Adjustment Act. Once more we have conclusive evidence that in a crucial case the Supreme Court may generally be depended upon to hand down an opinion helpful to predatory privilege and hostile to the common man.

It is evident from the Court's decision that there is very little, if anything, left for the farmers and producers any time a question of constitutionality affecting their interests comes before that tribunal. Almost invariably they get adverse decisions like this latest one. It is impossible to visualize the ultimate effect of the nullification of the A. A. A. and its benefits to the agricultural class if these benefits should actually cease through the ruling of the Supreme Court. To say the least, the effect would be disastrous.

It seems that legislative minds are usually ahead of judicial minds. This has been proved in other cases that have come before the Supreme Court when it declared measures unconstitutional, and after a period of years had intervened, reversed itself and discovered the same measures to be constitutional. If we were willing to let millions of American farmers starve in the interim, probably the Supreme Court could be counted upon 5 or 10 years from now to turn a judicial somersault and announce that the Agricultural Adjustment Act and similar statutes are in accord with the basic law to the most minute detail.

It happens, however, that we who are committed to a genuine New Deal for the masses and who do not intend to permit humanitarian measures to be thwarted by cunning legal processes and high-sounding phrases are not willing to consent to a 5- or 10-year starvation period.

As for my part, I am willing to stay here in Washington until next September, or longer if necessary to do so, in order to obtain justice for our farmers and workers. In my judgment, it is time to establish the truth of the statement of Justices Stone, Brandeis, and Cardoza in their minority opinion that "the courts are not the only agency of government that must be assumed to have capacity to govern." It is also time to terminate the state of affairs described in the words of Gov. Charles E. Hughes, of New York, some years ago—words that Supreme Court Justice Charles E. Hughes probably wishes had not been uttered—when he said:

We are under a Constitution, but the Constitution is what the judges say it is.

Never has the ringing answer of Abraham Lincoln to the Dred Scott decision been more appropriate as a guiding principle for the masses of the country than today. Lincoln said then what the forces of social justice in the United States may well assert now with respect to the Supreme Court's decisions concerning the Frazier-Lemke Act, the N. R. A., and the A. A. A.:

My answer: Somebody has to reverse that decision, and we mean to reverse it. If the policy of the Government upon vital questions affecting the whole people is to be irrevocably fixed by decisions of the Supreme Court, * * * in ordinary litigation between parties in personal actions, the people will have ceased to be their own rulers, having to that extent practically resigned their Government into the hands of that eminent tribunal.

Or we may quote from another outstanding President, Theodore Roosevelt, who made this vigorous pronouncement of popular rights:

I do speak. Let the people recall the decision. The highest right of a free people is the right to make their own laws; and this right does not exist if under the pretense of interpretations an outside body can nullify the laws. I hold that the people should say finally whether these decisions are or are not to stand as the laws of the land.

As I have frequently stated on other occasions, the point at issue in considering decisions of the Supreme Court such as those dealing with the A. A. A., the N. R. A., and the Frazier-Lemke law, is not the virtue or value—or lack of them—of these statutes, but the arrogant use of unauthorized power to block any legislation regulating big business. It is not because the laws enacted under the New Deal have been stringent that predatory wealth is so gleeful when the Supreme Court rules that they are unconstitutional. It is because predatory wealth does not want to submit to any regulation, severe or mild, because it wants to be above all law, because it wants to maintain at all times, without any restraint, or even the slightest suggestion of possible future restraint, its financial and industrial dictatorship, that these decisions are so welcome.

Back of all of these reactionary court rulings is the basic question of whether Congress may enact legislation intended to lessen or abolish poverty without having its will thwarted by technicalities invoked by an oligarchy of "untouchables" beyond governmental reach and utterly indifferent to human rights.

The war is on between democracy and plutocracy. It must be fought out to the finish.

NEUTRALITY THE ALL-IMPORTANT ISSUE

Mr. HILDEBRANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the question of neutrality, the all-important issue.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILDEBRANDT. Mr. Speaker, the most important issue that confronts Congress is that of neutrality. Other questions sink into comparative insignificance beside that of keeping the flower of American manhood from being sacrificed in another barbarous and brutal international butchery.

It is my sincere hope that satisfactory common ground may be found whereby the President, the State Department, Senators NYE and CLARK, Representative MAVERICK, the National Peace Conference, the National Council for Prevention of War, both Houses of Congress, and all groups seeking to avoid American participation in another world conflict, may agree on neutrality legislation.

I am emphatically in favor of a permanent mandatory ban on shipments of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to any warring country; on loans to belligerents; and on transportation by American ships of any article whatever to belligerents or to neutral nations for reshipment to belligerents. I am likewise strongly in favor of laying down the principle that our citizens who want to travel in war zones must do so at their own risk.

With utmost confidence in the great humanitarian who is our President today, I am keenly aware, however, of the danger of permitting future Executives to exercise discretionary power with respect to embargoes. While I trust that we are so clearly committed to policies of peace and social justice that no Chief Magistrate in times to come would ever violate the spirit of a less stringent neutrality law, and, by discriminating between fighting governments, indirectly lead us into war, I am not willing to take chances. The risk is too great. The lessons of the past are too terrible.

The proposal to include cotton, copper, scrap iron, and similar commodities under the caption of "Implements of war" is a logical one. There is hardly a commodity of any kind which does not become an implement of war when nations are engaged in hostilities. To attempt to draw fine distinctions, selling belligerents articles that seem harmless and refusing to sell those that are obviously of military usefulness, is out of the question. It is impossible to tell how much or how little any salable goods may or may not contribute to waging warfare. The only safe and sure way out of the dilemma is to sell nothing whatever to any nation at war. By supplementing this with a rule prohibiting our ships from transporting any article, whether on the embargo list or not, to warring countries or to neutral countries to be reshipped to those at war, we shall make our neutrality regulations about as nearly airtight and foolproof as we possibly can.

The embargo on flotation of loans in this country by any belligerent is all-important and cannot be stressed too strongly. Back of war there are almost invariably commercial and financial interests and motives. These interests and motives must be held in a grip of iron by our Government if we are to save America from again being dragged into a festival of slaughter.

While the Government's neutrality policy to date with respect to the Italo-Ethiopian conflict is most commendable, we must not allow ourselves to be lulled to sleep by false optimism. It is altogether too easy to assume that we are safely isolated and in no peril of being swept into the war current. As a matter of fact, few of us in the early stages of the World War ever dreamed that the United States would become involved in it. All of us know now that it was only when American bankers' loans to the Allies were jeopardized by repeated German successes that this country declared war against the Central Powers. All of us remember also the widespread cunning and treacherous campaign of lies, half lies, distortions of facts, and subtle insinuations that served to inflame the public mind and whip people into a fury.

Hardly a sane man or woman will hesitate to admit that war is horrible, wasteful, sordid, and utterly indefensible, except in rare and isolated instances. We admitted all that two decades ago. Yet we permitted ourselves to be hypnotized by phrases and tales emanating from munitions makers, money lenders, and their agents. And all of us know what a nightmare of suffering followed.

Even before the United States entered the World War, Senator Robert M. La Follette, Sr., in a speech on the floor of the body of which he was a Member, appealed for organized effort so that "never again after this conflict has ceased shall the autocratic heads of European governments have it in their power, through secret diplomacy, to bring on such another world catastrophe."

The ideal for which Wisconsin's great statesman so bravely battled nearly 20 years ago, and in defense of which he was so shamefully slandered, should be our ideal as the second session of the Seventy-fourth Congress begins its labors.

To the question which constitutes the title of the splendid book on the World War, published some years ago by John Kenneth Turner—"Shall It Be Again?"—there should and must be but one answer—the uncompromising "No" of the united American people.

THE SUPREME COURT AND THE T. V. A.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, and to include therein some short quotations from the report of the Army engineers of the War Department.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, the Supreme Court of the United States is asked by the selfish power interests to declare the T. V. A. Act unconstitutional because it authorizes the Government through the T. V. A. to sell at wholesale the surplus power generated in the Tennessee River and to build transmission lines over which it is to be transmitted to the purchaser.

Of course, there can be nothing in the Constitution itself dealing with electric power as such, for the reason that it never came into use until more than 90 years after the Constitution was adopted. It came into use with the invention of the electric light by Thomas A. Edison, about 1880, which invention also gave us the spark to fire the gas that makes the motor machine possible. That invention made possible the automobile, the airplane, the submarine, the X-ray, the radio, and all that great multiplicity of electrical appliances by the use and operation of which this power is to be consumed. It made possible this electric age.

Strange as it may seem, every one of the present members of the Supreme Court was born, and a majority of them had graduated from college, before the electric light was ever invented, the use of electric power as such was ever developed, or its existence as such was even known.

At that time the most learned men of our country were ignorantly oblivious of those hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of electric energy then going to waste in the waters of our navigable streams.

It reminds us of a chapter from Gulliver's Travels to witness the feeble efforts of these Brobdingnagian lawyers trying to convince the Supreme Court of the United States that because the Constitution does not expressly give Congress the right to deal with electric power, which the framers of that document did not even know existed at that time, then any attempt on the part of Congress to deal with this great natural resource so as to make it possible for the American people to use it violates the Constitution and is therefore null and void.

Their contention is that, while we own this great wealth of electric energy in our navigable streams—a wealth that exceeds any other natural resource we possess, outside of the soil from which we live—yet we cannot generate and dispose of that power because it is not so nominated in the Constitution.

The logic of their argument is that because the Constitution fails to clothe the Congress with the expressed authority to deal with a commodity that was not known to exist at the time the Constitution was written, this great wealth, which has now become one of the necessities of life, must be permitted to run waste and wanton to the sea.

It was not the intention of the framers of the Constitution that it should be understood by only a few corporation lawyers. That document was written for the government of all the American people.

The two ablest, wisest, and greatest men in the Constitutional Convention were not lawyers—George Washington and Benjamin Franklin. They were writing a document for the guidance and government of generations yet to come. They realized their inability to foresee all the contingencies that might arise, and wrote the welfare clause into the Constitution along with the rest, from all of which Congress derives certain implied powers, without which this Government would hardly be able to function.

Among those implied powers, which everyone concedes, and which even the attorneys for the power companies admitted in their oral argument before the Supreme Court, is the power to improve navigation and to provide for flood control on these navigable streams. That power is not even questioned by anyone, but is admitted by all.

In the exercise of those implied powers, the Government has built these high dams on the Tennessee River. The water falling over those dams, if properly used, will generate hundreds of thousands of horsepower of electric energy, much of which is needed by the Government itself to carry on the work of improving navigation, providing for the national defense, and so forth.

Will anyone, except a Power Trust lawyer, contend that the Government does not have the implied power to install machinery and generate this power that would otherwise go to waste?

Most assuredly not. Such a contention would be too absurd for serious consideration. This power is inextricably interwoven with the flow of the stream and must either be generated by the Government at these dams or be forever lost.

Now, since the Government has installed this machinery, and is generating more power than it needs, it surely has the right to dispose of the surplus. Having the right to dispose of this surplus power it certainly has the implied power to provide the means for disposing of it—building lines, installing transformers, and so forth.

Can it be said that the Government has the right to generate and dispose of this power, but does not have the right to transmit it? That is exactly what the Power Trust is trying to get the Supreme Court to say.

They admit that the Government has the right to generate and sell this power, provided it sells it to them at their own price. But they deny the right of the Government to build a transmission line to sell it to anyone else. That would be unconstitutional, according to their argument.

The implied right or power to generate and sell this electricity necessarily carries with it the implied power to build transmission lines or do whatever else is necessary, within legal bounds, to dispose of this power.

Prior to the passage of the T. V. A. Act this same power concern that now brings this suit—under a flimsy disguise that deceives no one—this same power concern was buying this electricity at 2 mills a kilowatt-hour and selling it to the domestic consumers within 1 mile of the dam at 10 cents a kilowatt-hour, or a profit of 4,800 percent.

Of course, that was constitutional, according to their paid attorneys who are now attempting to have the T. V. A. Act set aside.

The power company paid the sum of $2 for 1,000 kilowatt-hours of electric energy and sold it to a domestic consumer for $66.10, provided one consumer bought the entire 1,000 kilowatt-hours. But at that time the average domestic monthly consumption in that area was 30 kilowatt-hours. For that 1,000 kilowatt-hours for which this company paid the Government the sum of $2 these small consumers paid $300, or a difference of $298.

Of course, buying this 1,000 kilowatt-hours of power for $2 and selling it to these helpless consumers for $300 was entirely constitutional according to these attorneys for the Power Trust.

They were not robbing the Government; they were robbing the consumers. They want to go back to it. That is what this lawsuit is about. The people are about to escape from such bondage. That 1,000 kilowatt-hours which the power company purchased for $2 and sold to 1 consumer for $66.10 or to 30 consumers for $300 may now be purchased by 1 consumer for $8.90 or distributed among 30 consumers for $30 without loss to the Government. But, of course, that is unconstitutional according to these Power Trust lawyers.

Remember the T. V. A. is not selling this power at retail, but is selling it wholesale to various municipalities, and they are retailing it to their consumers at these rates.

Remember the Government was not selling this power below the cost of production when delivering it to the power company at 2 mills a kilowatt-hour. The Government was really making a profit of more than one-half a mill per kilowatt-hour.

The report of the Chief of Army Engineers which was submitted to Congress by Hon. Patrick J. Hurley, Secretary of War, on March 24, 1930, shows what it costs to produce and transmit this power. In part I of that report, House Document No. 328, Seventy-first Congress, second session, at page 530, we find the following statement with reference to the cost of generating and distributing this power:

The sales prices for Wilson Dam power necessary to obtain in order to pay 4 percent on the investment in plant and transmission lines and to cover the cost of operation and maintenance (indefinitely) of these are based upon the known cost of the hydro plant to date, a careful estimate of additional installation at costs of the present installation, and upon estimates of the cost of transmission lines and of operation, depreciation, etc. It is seen, therefore, that these prices are based largely upon known costs, and that an error in the items estimated would affect the sales prices but little. The hydro prices, reduced to mills per kilowatt-hour, would be as follows:

	Mills per kilowatt-hour
At the switchboard	1.352
Transmitted—
100 miles	1.993
200 miles	2.310
250 miles	2.467
300 miles	2.625
350 miles	2.775

If it be thought necessary to add 20 percent to the hydro prices in order to be on the safe side, the cost of prime power to the purchaser would be increased only 8.8 percent at a distance of 350 miles and 7.6 percent at a distance of 100 miles, and the prime power costs would be as follows with Wilson Dam power transmitted:

Transmitted—	Mills per kilowatt-hour
100 miles	3.893
200 miles	4.134
250 miles	4.268
300 miles	4.402
350 miles	4.531

These would still be very tempting prices, and especially tempting to companies depending upon steam power; and if these costs were increased 10 percent the power would still be salable. And, referring to chart II, appendix G, section C, it will be seen that a circle having a radius of 350 miles passes through Dayton, Ohio, falls a few miles short of Indianapolis, Ind., Springfield, Ill., Springfield, Mo., Alexandria and New Orleans, La., Tallahassee, Fla., and Williamson, W. Va. Less than the west half of this circle will afford a market for all the power that can be produced at Wilson Dam.

In other words, taking into consideration every single element of cost, this power could be delivered at the switchboard for 1.352 mills per kilowatt-hour and could be delivered 350 miles away at Dayton, Ohio, for instance, at 4.531 mills, or less than half a cent a kilowatt-hour.

This report of the Army engineers, at the bottom of page 531, further says:

The next step is to estimate the transmission costs, including line losses of the hydro power. To supply the prospective market under consideration it is estimated that the average transmission distance would be 250 miles, and, based upon transmission-cost data worked up in the Nashville office, a copy of which constitutes a part of appendix G, section C, of this report, this would be 1.118 mills per kilowatt-hour, including line losses.

Having the average cost of hydro power at the switchboard and the average cost of transmission over the average distance, 1,358 plus 1.118 equals 2.470 mills per kilowatt-hour, equals the average cost of the hydrc power delivered at an average distance of 250 miles.

Thus it will be seen that this power can be generated and transmitted 250 miles—according to this unbiased report of the Army engineers—for 2.47 mills a kilowatt-hour, after taking into consideration every single element of cost.

Yet the power company was buying this power at 2 mills a kilowatt-hour and selling it to the domestic consumers in Alabama, Tennessee, and Mississippi at the exorbitant rates above mentioned.

Here are the rates in effect in that section of the country prior to the passage of the Muscle Shoals bill. These were the average rates. I take them from the book called "N. E. L. A.", the National Electric Light Association, which has been referred to before as the "prayer book of the Power Trust." The National Electric Light Association has been succeeded by the Edison Electric Institute. Compare them with the T. V. A. rates which I am placing in a parallel column.

These are the published rates to the domestic consumers that were in effect prior to the time the T. V. A. bill was passed:

	Former power company rates	Tennessee Valley Authority rates
10 cents per kilowatt-hour first 30 kilowatt-hours	$3.00	$0.90
8 cents per kilowatt-hour next 170 kilowatt-hours	13.60	3.60
7 cents per kilowatt-hour next 300 kilowatt-hours	21.00	2.40
6 cents per kilowatt-hour next 350 kilowatt-hours	21.00	1.40
5 cents per kilowatt-hour next 150 kilowatt-hours	7.50	.60
1,000 kilowatt-hours	6.10	.90

For $8.90, under the T. V. A. rates, a householder now gets 1,000 kilowatt-hours a month, which would have cost him $66.10 under the power-company rates in effect at the time the Muscle Shoals bill was passed.

Although that 1,000 kilowatt-hours was costing the power company only $2 at the switchboard, yet the cost of it to one consumer was $66.10, and when distributed among 30 domestic consumers it cost them $300.

It seems to have been entirely constitutional, in the opinion of the attorneys for the power companies, for the Government to sell them the power and permit them to extort money from the helpless consumers through these outrageous rates; but when it comes to the T. V. A. selling this power wholesale to municipalities, such as Tupelo, Corinth, Athens, or Pulaski, for them to retail to the people at reasonable rates, above quoted, then the transaction becomes unconstitutional.

The attorneys for the power companies told the Supreme Court in their oral argument that there was a surplus of power in that area and that there was no market for additional power.

That was one of the most flagrant misrepresentations I have ever heard. The facts are that, even at the present time, the rates are so high that the people who patronize those power companies use, on an average less than 50 kilowatt-hours a month, while the ones enjoying the T. V. A. rates use 125 kilowatt-hours a month.

But the worst part of it is that a vast majority of the people in that area were then, and are now, denied the use of any electricity at all. The record shows that only one family out of seven in the State of Alabama enjoyed the use of any electricity at all, and only about 1 farmer out of 20 even had electric lights in his home. A similar situation existed in Tennessee, and a worse one in Mississippi. Only one family out of seven even had electric lights in Mississippi at the time the T. V. A. was created, and I dare say there was not 1 farmer out of 50 that enjoyed the use of any electricity at all at that time.

Now, when the T. V. A. is making it possible for those people to use this great God-given natural resource, this grasping outfit comes and attempts to mislead the Supreme Court, and asks that august tribunal to stultify itself by declaring the T. V. A. Act unconstitutional, and thereby shut the door of hope in the faces of the overburdened consumers of electric lights and power.

Will the Supreme Court say that this vast wealth of hydroelectric power in this stream must be permitted to run wasted to the sea while millions of our people are in need of it merely because the express power to generate it was not given by the Constitution, which was written 90 years before the use of electric power was ever known?

Or, conceding the right to generate this power, will the Supreme Court hold, in effect, that having generated this power, the Government cannot dispose of it?

Admitting that the Government has the right to generate and dispose of this surplus power, will the Supreme Court hold that it does not have the right to build the transmission lines necessary to carry it to the point of delivery, but must sell it at the place produced where the only purchaser is the very power concern behind this suit?

Will the Supreme Court of the United States hold that the Government must either let this wealth of power go to waste, or else deliver it to the Power Trust for them to rob and plunder the ultimate consumers through exorbitant light and power rates?

Will they thus set aside the progress that has been made toward reducing light and power rates to a point that enables the American people to enjoy the benefits of this great natural resource?

Will they thus shut the door of hope in the faces of the distressed farmers of this country, who have heretofore been denied the use of any electricity at all, but who are now being supplied with T. V. A. power through their local power associations or municipalities?

Will the Supreme Court of the United States thus blast the hopes of the toiling women of this country, to whom cheap electricity is the greatest blessing they have ever known, strike the light from the homes, and hope from the hearts of the mothers who do the work, keep the homes, and rear the children of this country?

Will those nine men turn these mothers back into the dark, or drive them back to the washtub and the scrubboard, in order to gratify the cupidity of the Power Trust and enable them to continue to wring from the American consumers $1,000,000,000 a year in overcharges for electric lights and power?

Shades of George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, and Thomas A. Edison! May your immortal spirits whisper to the Supreme Court as they consider this great question that affects the happiness and well-being of the American people for all time to come!

PRIVATE CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Private Calendar.

ESTATE OF BENJAMIN A. PILLSBURY

The Clerk called the first bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 7821, for the relief of the estate of Benjamin A. Pillsbury (William J. Pillsbury, executor).

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COSTELLO and Mr. CLARK of Idaho objected, and the bill, under the rule, was recommitted to the Committee on War Claims.

HELEN MAHAR JOHNSON

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8220, for the relief of Helen Mahar Johnson.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Two objections are required. Is there further objection?

There was no further objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Helen Mahar Johnson, of Gilboa, N. Y., the remarried widow of James P. Mahar, the sum of $5,000 in full satisfaction of any and all claims of the estate of James P. Mahar for United States Government life-insurance benefits under policy no. K-812772.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RODMAN CHEMICAL CO.

The Clerk called the next business, H. J. Res. 223, conferring upon the Court of Claims jurisdiction of the claim of the Rodman Chemical Co. against the United States.

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claim of the Rodman Chemical Co., a corporation organized under the laws of Pennsylvania, for compensation for the use by the United States, prior to the issuance of letters patent therefor, of the process invented by Hugh Rodman for making activated carbon, for which letters patent have subsequently been issued to such corporation, the assignee of such inventor, notwithstanding no order to keep such invention secret was issued by the Commissioner of Patents as provided in the act entitled "An act to prevent the publication of inventions by the grant of patents that might be detrimental to the public safety or convey useful information to the enemy, to stimulate invention, and provide adequate protection to owners of patents, and for other purposes", approved October 6, 1917.

SEC. 2. In any such suit the said Rodman Chemical Co. shall be entitled to recover reasonable compensation for such use to the same extent as if prior to such use an order had been issued by the Commissioner of Patents as provided in such act, and such compensation shall begin from the date of such use by the United States; and the transcript of record in Interference Proceeding No. 46630 between John C. Woodruff, appellant, against Hugh Rodman, Court of Appeals, District of Columbia, April term, 1925, Patent Appeal Docket No. 1815, shall be competent and admissible evidence before the Court of Claims on the issue of the use by the United States of said invention.

SEC. 3. Suit may be instituted as provided in this joint resolution at any time within 1 year after the date of its enactment, notwithstanding the lapse of time or any statute of limitations. Proceedings in such suit, and appeals from, and payment of, any judgment therein shall be had in the same manner as in the case of claims over which the Court of Claims has jurisdiction under section 145 of the Judicial Code, as amended.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 3, line 7, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 4. In any such suit the Government has a right to avail itself to any and all defenses, general or special, which might be pleaded by a defendant in an action for infringement as set forth in Title 60 of the Revised Statutes, or otherwise."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have until midnight tonight to file a report from the Committee on Ways and Means relative to the payment of the adjusted-service certificates.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. RANKIN. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I should like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina when we may expect that bill to be taken up for consideration in the House?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Just as early as we can do it under the parliamentary procedure. We hope to get it up by Thursday of this week in any event.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PRIVATE CALENDAR

ORVILLE E. CLARK

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 1867, for the relief of Orville E. Clark.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Orville E. Clark, late captain, Second Pioneer Infantry, the sum of $240, representing the 1 month's pay authorized by section 9, act of May 18, 1917, and not received by him upon his honorable discharge from the service on March 4, 1918, under the provisions of the above act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JOHN J. FOLEY

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4435, for the relief of John J. Foley.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HANCOCK of New York and Mr. HOPE objected, and the bill, under the rule, was recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

JAMES H. SMITH

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1179, for the relief of James H. Smith.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOPE, Mr. HANCOCK of New York, and Mr. COSTELLO objected, and the bill, under the rule, was recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

MARION SHOBER PHILLIPS

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1935, for the relief of Marion Shober Phillips.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Idaho and Mr. HOPE objected, and, under the rule, the bill was recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

HERMAN SCHIERHOFF

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 977, for the relief of Herman Schierhoff.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000 to Herman Schierhoff to compensate him for injuries received by being struck by a wagon the property of the United States Army.

With the following committee amendments:

In line 5, strike out the figures "$5,000" and insert "$750."

In line 6, strike out the words "to compensate him" and insert in lieu thereof the clause "in full settlement of all claims against the United States."

At the end of the bill strike out the period, insert a comma, and add the following: "on or about October 20, 1931, at Jefferson Barracks, Mo.: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ODESSA MASON

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1252, for the relief of Odessa Mason.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Odessa Mason, of the city of Newport, Tenn., the sum of $1,500 for bodily injuries sustained by her on September 13, 1933, when an automobile in which she was riding was in collision with a truck of the Civilian Conservation Corps on State Highway No. 75.

With the following committee amendments:

In line 6, strike out the figures "$1,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$750."

In line 6, after the amount, insert "in full settlement of all claims against the United States."

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to James Murphy Morgan, of Miami, Ariz., the sum of $15,879.43. Such sum shall be in full settlement of all claims against the United States on account of damages to the Morgan automobile and damages sustained by the said James Murphy Morgan when he was injured in an automobile collision with a United States owned truck (Civilian Conservation Corps truck) near Claypool, Gila County, Ariz., on November 18, 1934.

With the following committee amendments:

In line 6, strike out the figures "$15,978.43" and insert "$10,000."

In lines 8 and 9, strike out the words "on account of damages to the Morgan automobile and damages sustained" and insert in lieu thereof "for permanent personal injuries, medical expenses, property damage, and loss of wages sustained."

At the end of the bill add: ": Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN CLAIMANTS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 7282, for the relief of certain claimants.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider a similar Senate bill (S. 2519) to confer jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claims of F. Mansfield & Sons Co., and others, in lieu of the House bill.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims of the United States to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claims of the F. Mansfield & Sons Co., N. P. Starbranch, Charles K. Wedmore, Charles E. Hamilton, Ernest E. Ball, the McNeil Oyster Co., the Thomas Oyster Co., the Connecticut Oyster Farms Co., and Fred C. Kral and George A. Rohr, partners trading under the name of Kral & Rohr, for a compensation for damages sustained by said claimants by reason of the injury to oysters on beds operated under perpetual franchises or leases from the State of Connecticut and injury to such oyster beds, caused by officers, employees, and/or agents of the United States in performing dredging work in the harbor of New Haven, Conn., in 1933, 1934, and 1935: Provided, That suit hereunder shall be instituted within 4 months from the date of the approval of this act, and proceedings therein shall be had in the same manner as in the case of claims over which the Court of Claims has jurisdiction, by virtue of section 145 of the Judicial Code, as amended.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

9418. By Mr. BACHARACH: Petition of some 600 employees of the Whitall Tatum Co., Millville, N. J., protesting against the imports of glass products from Japan, and urging the necessity of adequate protection being given to the American glassware industry; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

9419. By Mr. BOYLAN: Petitions from the American Friends of Italy, New York City, N. Y., protesting against American association with League of Nations sanction activities, etc.; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

9420. Also, resolution adopted by the Warehousemen's Association of the Port of New York, Inc., relative to waterfront properties of the Federal Government now under private operation; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

9421. By Mr. COLDEN: Resolution 1145, adopted by the Board of Harbor Commissioners of the City of Los Angeles, Calif., at a meeting held December 31, 1935, opposing House bill 3263, known as the Pettengill bill, and any similar bills which have been or may hereafter be introduced; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

9422. By Mr. PLUMLEY: Petition of Loggia C. Colombo, I. V., No. 414, O. F. di I. in America, Inc., protesting against our Government meddling with European sanctions and embargo policies; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 8, 1936

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite God, our Heavenly Father upon earth, we most gratefully rejoice that we find in Thee guidance when we are in health, comfort when we are in sickness, and strength when we are in adversity; glory be to Thy holy name! Do Thou gird us this day with the best, and may we choose well. Give us courage and aspiration that shall be tokens of Thy presence. Oh, turn men everywhere from their wicked ways; may they no longer strive for the exploits of carnal warfare but seek the higher achievements of the spirit. Heavenly Father, be Thou the bread of our lives, the light that we may see, the staff that we may walk, and the rock under whose shadow refreshment can be found. In the name of our Savior we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PAYMENT OF WORLD WAR ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. O'CONNOR, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following resolution (Rept. No. 1911), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

House Resolution 388

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 9870, a bill "To provide for the immediate payment of World War adjusted-service certificates, for the cancelation of unpaid interest accrued on loans secured by such certificates, and for other purposes." That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 4 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I had to stand trial in the police court of Washington, D. C. I was unable to get an official stenographer, as none was available, so I had my secretary go there and take the testimony. I have here a copy of the transcript of the proceedings as she reported them.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at this point in the RECORD I may insert this transcript of the testimony as she has written it. I have not read it myself, as I have not had the time.

I would further request, Mr. Speaker, that the testimony be printed in the regular 8-point type.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I question whether, if we permit this matter to be inserted in large type, we will not have similar requests from other Members. [Laughter.] I do not mean to cast any reflections upon my good friend; I just want to try to protect the RECORD.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania is doing very well in that respect, but this is an exceptional case, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RICH. Undoubtedly; but I question whether this matter ought to be printed in large type. For this reason, Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I asked this question at least twice during the last session, under the law could this request be granted? There is a standing law on the subject, and I do not think it can be waived by unanimous consent.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, being a law-abiding citizen, I modify my request and ask that it be printed in the regular type.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as far as I can remember, we have never put police-court records in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. This is not a police-court record.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, for the present, I shall be obliged to object.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. If the gentleman will reserve his objection for a moment, this is not a police-court record; this is a transcript of the testimony that was taken there. I think the Congress should know what went on. I think the gentleman should know what is going on there. I think it is informative. I am submitting it without comment. I think this is an exceptional case.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the gentleman's making any explanation he may wish at any time in regard to his own actions or those of anyone else.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I have no explanations to offer.

Mr. SNELL. But when it comes to putting these matters into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I think it is my duty to object.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Will the gentleman object to a request to put it in this RECORD as an extension of my own remarks?

Mr. SNELL. I am not going to allow that at the present time.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. But the gentleman may do so hereafter?

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

WAGNER LABOR-RELATIONS BILL

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a letter I have written concerning the labor-disputes bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter written by me to Maj. Roland A. Laird, assistant general manager of the Chamber of Commerce of Houston, Tex.:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 9, 1935.

Wagner labor-relations bill.

Maj. ROLAND A. LAIRD,
Assistant General Manager, Chamber of Commerce,
Houston, Tex.

DEAR MAJOR LAIRD: I am at my office this Sunday, as usual, at work; and I received at this hour your air-mail letter of the 8th about the Wagner labor-relations bill, asking me to help to kill that bill.

You assume to assure me what is the state of united opinion of an important employing group. That is a great responsibility you thus assume, and a very broad assertion you make.

I put my views on that important matter in the Houston Post recently, and I have answered over 1,000 letters from constituents, some for it and some against it, by sending copy of my views expressed in my letter to Mr. Powell to each of them; and I send copy with this as additional reply to your welcome letter.

I cannot agree with either the facts, the views, or the sentiments you express in your letter. We have no troublesome labor problem at Houston; but it is an issue affecting the entire Nation, and there is a mighty and acute labor problem in other sections of the country. Plainly my duty is to think and act for the welfare and good of my own community—which I do always—but also as a national legislator to think and vote in terms of the entire country.

True, what we have done here since March 4, 1933, has saved business and restored prosperity; but I cannot and will not agree that, after saving all business, we are now to turn over all labor throughout the Nation to the tender mercies of these northern and eastern labor employers to be exploited by them as formerly by their increasing the hours, decreasing the pay, using chiseling company unions to deal with, and restoring child labor—thus enslaving labor as it was enslaved before N. I. R. A., and as it will be again enslaved with N. I. R. A. dead unless labor has a fair national legal tribunal, to which it may take its grievances to be adjudicated if and when management may treat it with brutal injustice. This country can never be happy and prosperous unless producers of all sorts receive fair prices and labor of all sorts receives fair treatment.

The Wagner labor-relations bill as we have amended it in the Labor Committee of the House, since its passage through the Senate before the court decision as to N. I. R. A., does exactly what you say in your letter it does not do, and it does not do exactly what you say in your letter it does do.

My conclusion is not a hasty nor a superficial one but is based upon the developed facts, and is necessary if we are to make justice the rule of law in a civilized country.

For the above reasons, as well as those set forth in my Powell letter enclosed, I do not agree with you, and usual candor compels me, with all due respect, to say so in these unevasive terms.

You must feel free to show this to all those fine and worthy friends and gentlemen employers who directed you thus to write me.

With kind regards and best wishes,

Sincerely yours,

JOE H. EAGLE.

VERNER W. MAIN

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I send a privileged resolution to the Clerk's desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 389

Resolved, That VERNER W. MAIN be, and he is hereby, elected a member of the following standing committees of the House of Representatives, to wit: Census, Mines and Mining, and Flood Control.

The resolution was agreed to.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1937

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9863) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes; and pending this motion I ask unanimous consent that general debate shall continue through the day, to be equally divided and controlled between myself and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask if the debate will be concluded today?

Mr. WOODRUM. It will not be concluded today.

Mr. RANKIN. Will it be completed tomorrow?

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not know about tomorrow. I do not know what the situation will be then.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In reply to the inquiry made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], I think it is proper to state, for the information of all Members, it is the expectation, with the approval of the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations, to engage in general debate in connection with the independent offices appropriation bill today; but tomorrow that bill will be laid aside temporarily and a rule presented for the consideration of the bonus bill, which we hope will be acted upon before the end of the week. A vote upon that bill, however, is not expected until Friday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9863, with Mr. BOLAND in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts has a speaker who is very anxious to get away early, and I therefore yield to him at this time.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, before beginning the main subject of my discussion, and in view of what may be said upon the floor of this House with reference to the recent decision of the Supreme Court, I feel I should make a statement regarding the telegrams I have received and the comments, editorial and otherwise, which I have noted from my own section. We of New England rejoice that the burden of the processing tax has been removed. There is now some hope in the future for the textile industry. However, may we say to the farmers of the country that—reflecting all I have read from New England—we do sympathize with them. Indeed, at no time have I, nor, I think, any other New Englander, said upon the floor of this House that we object to assistance being rendered to the farmer through the Farm Credit Act and other reasonable legislation. New England will continue to vote to give all proper assistance.

In view of the subject under discussion here for the next few moments I cannot help but be one of those who may say, in consonance with the holiday spirit of recent weeks, "Glory to God in the highest, the Constitution is the savior of the Nation."

THE TOWNSEND PLAN

During recent months I have been increasingly amazed to discover how little the average person of intelligence who has not become actively associated with the Townsend organization knows about what the Townsend plan really is and means. This applies to politicians, officeholders, as well as to the rank and file of the electorate.

Under these circumstances it is small wonder that the ardent supporters of the proposition are inclined to be sharply critical of many of their critics and to charge them with attempting to dismiss with mere ridicule what is to them a serious proposal, which they believe designed to bring about a great change for the better in the social and economic structure of our Nation. Most supporters of Dr. Townsend's plan do have at least a conception of its purported aims and the method proposed for their achievement, although I find that even they have generally been left in the dark regarding the many modifications and alterations which have already been made in the original scheme. Some have, of course, studied the subject deeply and hence feel qualified to argue with authority. In consequence they believe, with some justification, that they are better qualified to pass judgment on the merits of the proposition than the uninformed critic and scoffer.

It is indeed most unfortunate that the public at large has not been better informed upon this subject. And the fault heretofore lies in part at the door of the Nation's press. That is the greatest disseminator of news and molder of the public opinion that we have today, yet it is only in very recent weeks that a considerable portion thereof has awakened to the fact that the Townsend movement has become a serious factor in America's social, economic, and political life. The weeklies in most of the smaller communities steer clear of any editorial discussion of the matter because of a natural and understandable unwillingness to jeopardize their none-too-secure financial situation by taking a stand which might antagonize a well-organized and active minority.

The Washington Post recently stated this:

They "crack down" on the newspapers. If an unfavorable editorial appears they shoot in a sheaf of petitions signed by readers of the offending newspaper. If the editorials persist, the newspapers will receive telephone calls canceling subscriptions. By these tactics Townsendites have cowed some of the most conservative newspapers in the Western States to the point where everyday there must appear news items about the Townsend plan activities. It is the old blackjack game of putting the newspapers on the spot.

True, the Townsend Weekly clearly and distinctly states that they do not believe in coercion or boycotting, but this is followed by the suggestion: "It is not necessary to support any paper that is working directly against our interest."

It is my own feeling that this subject should now be given the utmost publicity. Every man and woman in America should be informed, and informed fully thereon. They should be urged and encouraged to give it most serious thought. In this, I am sure, the proponents of the proposition and I can meet on common ground. The people—all the people, not a minority of them—must decide the fate of the plan. And they must decide right.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. GIFFORD. I prefer not to yield until I have concluded my remarks.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. For a very pertinent question?

Mr. GIFFORD. If I yield to the gentleman from Washington, I will have to yield to others. I will yield to the gentleman a little later. I have the gentleman's speech here, and I appreciate his views. I am trying to make a serious speech and not make it a subject for ridicule. It is too late for ridicule. The issue must be met.

I do not in the least question the sincerity of almost every supporter of Dr. Townsend's proposal, although doubtless—as in every movement—some are actuated by motives of self-interest and financial gain. Nor do I question the fact that they have been led into a burning belief that it provides a way alike to care for the aged, whom we have rightly been taught to honor, and to bring financial and social benefit to the Nation as a whole. The same applies with equal force to the supporters of several other schemes to insure social and economic justice, for one of which, at least, the claim is made that it has many more adherents than the Townsend plan.

I purpose, however, to confine my present discussion to this one only, and I feel that I can properly say that my comments are the result of a serious study of the problem. I have collected hundreds of clippings—letters, editorials, and news items—on this plan. I have gathered and read them impartially. I am a reader of the Townsend Weekly. Indeed, I have gone further than most Townsendites themselves. I have not only studied the basic plan but the several measures which have already been introduced in the Congress purposing to make it effective by legislation. We know—as most supporters of the plan apparently do not know—how its original form has already been modified, and why. I do, in fact, full well know how appealing to the imagination are its promises; how plausible many of the arguments advanced in support of them.

And since these have been presented to the public by an increasingly powerful and active organization over a period of some years, and to date answered only spasmodically by scattered individuals, it is no wonder that the movement has been accepted by a swelling number. They have been swept into its ranks by a wave of something akin to the religious fervor of a revival. Nor is it perhaps a reason for wonder that those zealous in the cause have become prone to make extravagant statements in opposition to any who declare the plan impracticable, even though merely their economics, and not their honesty of purpose, has been challenged. Most of us must have heard the wholly unfair and unreasonable accusation hurled that those who oppose the plan are heartless and hostile to the aged. Who could be so meanly motivated? Who does not in all sincerity desire that our people shall have peace and financial security in their declining years, if this can possibly be provided?

The subject demands divorcement from such unfair accusations, on the one hand, and mere ridicule on the other. It must be viewed without prejudicial bias and in the cool light of reason. Unless there can be tolerance in the matter, free debate and sane thinking, there is tragedy ahead for America.

There is a familiar saying, "The wish is father of the thought." Let us be very sure that in this instance a mere noble wish is not substituted for thinking.

We often hear the question: Other plans have been tried and failed; so why not try this one? Of course, that is not an argument and can properly be dismissed. Not so easy is it to dismiss another inquiry which is often made: If you assert that the Townsend plan will not work, have you a better one to propose? Of course, that is not an argument in favor of the plan either, but it does need an answer. I would say that before any still more radical and experimental scheme is attempted, the social-security law enacted by the last session of Congress should be tried out and amended as may be found advisable by experience. But, more than that, I would say that even the present social and economic system, in spite of such faults as it may have, is far, far better than the Townsend plan. That would not only fail to bring the benefits to the aged or the Nation at large claimed for it, but would necessarily result in disaster and probably ruin. And its inevitable collapse would cause far greater suffering and heartaches to the old than they have ever yet known in our America. It is with the hope of saving them—and all of us—that we must show why we know that the plan carries within it the seeds of its own destruction; why it is indeed economically unsound and merely a dreamer's dream of the sort of utopia we would all like to see, if it could be attained—an illusion and a delusion.

As a good sample of arguments advanced by speakers for the plan, I attach a short report, as follows:

We must provide safety and security for the people over 60 and plenty of jobs for people under 60.

When that is accomplished, the Townsend Club won't disband. Oh, no; we'll tackle the problem of aliens in this country; we'll tackle the whole tax system; we'll fix J. P. Morgan.

This is a friendly educational proposition.

The first Townsend plan bill introduced into Congress had a few soft spots. The bill as it now stands is just as much inspired by God Almighty as was the Emancipation Proclamation of Abraham Lincoln.

What we need is more brotherly love in our daily activity.

Our critics tell the truth, but only part of the truth.

You can't disprove this plan by statistics of an isolated community. This is a Nation-wide program based on the law of averages.

Who knows? The Townsend plan may pay off the whole indebtedness of the United States.

The transactions tax is a tax to equalize all taxes.

By relieving young people of the burden of supporting their elders, the Townsend plan will permit them to marry and have babies. It is wrecking the country to have so many young people remaining single and devoting all their money to supporting old people.

Every banker I have explained the Townsend plan to is now in favor of it. I have tackled some of the biggest bankers in Boston. (Quotations from the address of Wilbur F. Beale to Falmouth Men's Club.)

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Will the gentleman yield now, as the end of his time is approaching?

Mr. GIFFORD. I have all the time I may desire.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I want to ask the gentleman this question, and I should like to have his answer to it: Why is it that the Republicans in the West are the sponsors of the Townsend movement and are financing it?

Mr. GIFFORD. I feel free to acknowledge that probably 80 percent of the people in my district who have endorsed it are Republicans.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Are Republicans so unintelligent as to go for such a scheme as this?

Mr. GIFFORD. I was going to answer that later on in my speech, and that is the reason I feel I should not permit myself to be interrupted. I shall also call attention to the Sunny South and state why they are there unable to endorse this movement.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for just a moment?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have been following the gentleman's address with great interest, because I am sure we all want to get as much information as we can about this proposed program.

Is there anything that would prevent the beneficiaries of the Townsend plan from investing all over and above their actual living expenses in Government bonds, for instance?

Mr. GIFFORD. I understand they cannot do that. They must spend all of it, except 10 percent, for commodities within the United States, but not necessarily manufactured in the United States. They can spend it for commodities and give all those commodities to their children if they so desire.

The Townsend plan is vulnerable at so many points that the difficulty is not so much to find flaws as to restrict oneself presenting them. One could enlarge upon them almost indefinitely.

The claim is made by the proponents of the plan that its adoption would practically end crime and thus save the Nation billions of dollars. Would more leisure, as a certain type of youth battens on the pensions paid their parents or grandparents—and more automobiles—do away with crime? True, poverty does at times drive people to crime, but a careful perusal of the records of the criminal courts will disclose comparatively few crimes of a character that would presumably be lessened by such largesses. On the contrary, the additional money and effects in the possession of the aged and defenseless would certainly furnish an additional temptation to those with innate criminal tendencies. With criminals, as with most other people, the more they have the more they desire. Moreover, human nature being what it is, the necessity for every pensioner to make a return certifying that he had spent the full amount of his pension monthly would inevitably lead, in many cases, to evasion.

According to Dr. Walter Spahr, a recognized economist, we would be turned into a nation of liars and lawbreakers. I fear that this is not an overstatement.

The plan presupposes not only an annual income of $2,400 per year for almost everyone over 60 years of age, but that this amount would be spent for commodities within the same period and create an equal number of new jobs paying the same amount by way of wages. This has undoubtedly made many adherents for the plan among the younger people. But it should be obvious that, even if such a pension could be paid, it would not all be spent for things requiring reproduction, immediately or ever. The element of thrift and saving has not yet been wholly eradicated from the American character. Certainly if my wife and I were to receive the sum of $4,800 per year, our Yankee instincts would cause us to purchase some commodities of permanent intrinsic value—jewelry, antiques, equities in homes already built, and other things which would not require reproduction immediately. Even the purchase of an automobile or clothing would not mean that a duplicate article would have to be reproduced within the year.

When we examine the situation in many of our smaller communities—at least those in New England—we find that probably 60 percent of our people over the age of 60 have been provident and are still reasonably able to take care of themselves. Many of them are still active and their places in specialized business could not be taken by untrained younger men. Should the younger breadwinners, who have children to bring up and educate, be called upon to support this class as they would have to under the plan? Many of these younger men are now forced to work on Government work-relief projects, and at least half of them are faced with a difficult problem to exist. Yet 40 percent of their income would be needed to carry out the proposal, and we can hardly agree with Dr. Townsend in his statement before the Committee on Ways and Means that while prices would be expected to rise 100 percent, the minimum wage would be $10 per day. Experience has shown, again and again, that wages never do keep pace with skyrocketing prices. It is no reflection on the needy aged to assert that under existing conditions the younger generation of people having children to support and educate must be considered.

And what of those unfortunate people under 60 who are unable to labor and have no parents whose pensions they might share? Although the Townsend supporters maintain that all other pensions could be abolished if their plan works these would certainly have to be provided for from the public purse.

How about those incapacitated, those who have not any work at all—the widows and the orphans, who are not doing anything, and have no relative on this pension roll?

But more fatal than all these things would be the inescapable fact that prices would rise enormously with the pyramiding of a 2-percent tax on every transaction. They would certainly go so high that sufficient tariff walls could not be erected to protect American-made commodities and American labor. Even the necessities of life would come flowing in from abroad.

Then there is the matter of the stock market, from the transactions in which vast sums are to be obtained, according to the roseate claims of the Townsendites. Such transactions are so multitudinous and generally on such small margins that anyone must realize that the stock market could not continue to operate. It would be forced to close down almost immediately, thus destroying the whole financial and economic structure of the Nation, as well as promptly ending one of the largest sources of income claimed. Many of the great businesses which operate on a small margin of profit would necessarily find it practically impossible to go on.

Think of the appalling amount of auditing and bookkeeping that would be required. And remember, too, that everyone who sells anything, no matter how small, would have to be licensed and pay the tax. Think of the expense of this, alike to the businessman and the Government. Licensing agents and inspectors by the thousands would have to be added to the already overburdened Federal pay roll. To be sure, this would provide jobs, but again at the expense of the harassed taxpayers. Their work would not help to create wealth. They would merely be a new army of Federal Paul Prys. More Government supervision, regulation, and regimentation for struggling business to endure.

A little clear thinking should indicate that this alone would use up almost half of the funds supposed to be raised to pay annuitants, although here, too, plausible figures are presented in an attempt to refute or distort plain facts.

And while we are dealing with these huge figures—for if the revolving plan were to work as claimed, it would amount to $20,000,000,000 a year, two-thirds of our present national debt, one-half of our national income—it is well to remind ourselves that "money" is not wealth. Nor does the increase in the amount of currency or its circulation mean prosperity. If such were the case, Germany of 1923 would have been prosperous beyond any country, since marks were circulating daily by the billions. Instead it was a ruined, bankrupt nation.

One cannot too often repeat the axiomatic statement made by Calvin Coolidge, "You cannot spend your way into prosperity." No saner words were ever spoken.

These facts are recognized by practically every economist of established reputation. Unfortunately, until just lately these experts have ignored the whole subject, for the reason set forth by Dr. Spahr in a recent radio talk. Again I quote from him:

> When the Townsend plan first appeared its complete and utter ridiculousness was so obvious that no economist felt it necessary to pay the slightest attention to it. No economist wished to dignify the movement with so much as an answer. The good Dr. Townsend, his aides and organizers, and those Congressmen who subscribe to the plan, are carving out for themselves a most unenviable and uncomfortable place in the history of the Nation. It would wreck the country. It provides for an unconstitutional licensing plan. * * *

And here I wish to interpolate a word. In view of the recent decisions of the Supreme Court on the subject of certain attempted socialistic measures which give benefit to a part at the expense of the rest of the Nation, who can possibly doubt that this plan would be held unconstitutional in toto? I quote once more:

It would penalize thrift, saving, and investment; insurance and prudent living. The spread of this fantastic scheme shows that it is high time that the people of this country wake up and get a grip on themselves.

In his annual message of January 4, 1935, the President declared—

The morale of the Nation has been restored.

Those words rang in my ears for a long time, since I had very real doubts as to whether this were true. And since the astonishing spread of the Townsend plan, as well as other panaceas of equally questionable value, I am now firmly convinced that the morale of the country appears rather to have been sadly weakened than restored.

The preceding comments have been made on the assumption—but not admitting—that by some miracle the sum of $200 per month might for a time be provided as pensions for those over 60 in order to put the Townsend plan, as originally proposed, into operation. Contrary to the general understanding, however, there is nothing to this effect in the new bill, introduced by Congressman McGROARTY, to give the plan legislative sanction.

The following is a quotation from the pen of Paul Block:

It is unfortunate that so many of our people will listen to such wild and impossible schemes as Dr. Townsend is preaching. However, there is an explanation. It is a natural outcome of the New Deal philosophy. For nearly 3 years the administration playboys have been teaching a vast number of our people how to try to get something for nothing. They have emphasized the old saying that the Government owes everyone a living, so he doesn't have to try to help himself, as the Government will look after him.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. When the bill was under consideration in the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress, it was stated that the 2-percent transaction tax would bring in only about $40 a month.

Mr. GIFFORD. I do not recall that.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I think it was so stated, and out of that $40 a month there would be 12 transactions, which would be 24 percent.

Mr. GIFFORD. I desired to speak first of the general conditions relating to the subject. If we are going into figures and statistics—they have their figures and statistics—general principles should be first discussed. Everyone knows that an automobile costing around $600 would go up in price to $1,000 at least, every transaction going into its manufacture being taxed from the beginning of the mining of what goes into the automobile, and including labor costs and everything else.

I should like to interpolate a word here. In view of the recent decisions of the Supreme Court on certain attempted socialistic measures to benefit a part at the expense of the remainder of the Nation, this plan would be held unconstitutional in toto; but will it stop the movement?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. GIFFORD. There is an old motto that rang in my ears when a boy. "Give me liberty or give me death!" It seems to be now, "Give me liberty or give me death—but anyhow, gimme."

This new measure practically admits that the original and often-quoted scheme for a miraculous revolving fund would not raise sufficient funds to pay these pensions, for there is in addition a demand for 10 percent on all income taxes levied by the Revenue Act of 1934. Also a 2-percent tax on all inheritance and gifts in excess of $500. This would obviously necessitate new and additional levies on all taxpayers in order to meet the national expenses, which are mounting already at such a prodigious rate. And it is a far cry from the enthusiastic estimates formerly made, and which were accompanied by the statement that there would not only be sufficient revenue obtained from the 2-percent transaction tax to pay pensions at the rate of $200 a month to those over 60 but that the national debt could also be paid off therefrom and other taxes lowered or abolished.

This new bill merely provides that from the amounts raised, as aforementioned, after all administrative expenses—and they would necessarily be enormous—had been paid, the sum remaining would be divided among the annuitants. Nowhere does the amount $200—except the words "not exceeding $200"—appear, and liberal estimates show that even if the plan could work the most that would be paid would probably be not over $50 a person. And with this the pensioner, as well as everyone else, would be faced with prices increased 50 to 100 percent. Thus, even if the plan is given the benefit of every conceivable doubt, the relatively small minority which would be benefited by it in a direct financial manner would profit little, while the vast majority would be burdened beyond possible endurance.

I read with much interest a statement ascribed to Congressman MAVERICK, of Texas, to the effect that if the plan should be put into operation the country would be ruined in 2 weeks. This is a startling assertion, but it seems to me that a little clear thought will demonstrate its accuracy. Certainly it is hard to conceive that a single Member of Congress from a State south of the Mason and Dixon Line could support such a proposal. Without wishing to draw any invidious comparisons, I would call attention to the fact that such a sum as $4,800 per year tossed into the laps of a husband and wife of the elder generation of those who form so large a portion of the laboring class of the Southland would almost inevitably mean a complete cessation of work by all members of the families comprising that class there. Chaos would follow. I point this out not only to indicate one more of the flaws in the plan but to show how impossible it is that it should be made effective by legislation. It could not pass the Congress. But if it should do so, against all human probability, the Supreme Court would rule it unconstitutional at the first opportunity. In consequence, it is cruel for anyone to hearten its sincere but misguided adherents by offering them the encouragement of lip service to their cause.

According to the avowed purposes of the now powerful organization behind this proposal, all United States Senators and Representatives in Congress are to be put on the spot. Well, some of us, at least, have voluntarily gone on the spot before being placed there. It is most unfortunate, however, that in most cases candidates for other public offices are enabled to express themselves as at least sympathetic to the plan, even though they may not actually endorse it. Since they are not to be called upon to decide the matter by their votes, they have nothing to fear for themselves politically. But their attitude toward it makes just so much the more difficult the position of the Congressman who is obliged to oppose it.

We also find a similar unwillingness to take a firm and open stand against the movement evidenced by the businessmen in communities where Townsend clubs have been formed. They may fully realize the dangers to themselves inherent in the proposition, but it is natural for them to hesitate openly to express their opposition lest they lose customers. It once again demonstrates the familiar fact that "self-preservation"—not in the future but right now—"is the first law of nature."

And they are scarcely to be blamed. Well may they have cause to fear the "crack down" methods now being employed in some sections by this well-financed movement—this powerfully organized minority; misguided, but almost fanatical in its sincerity of purpose. It now appears that the original dues of 25 cents per month for membership are augmented by a fee of $12 a year, paid by the so-called legionnaires within the larger organization. According to their own publication—the Townsend Weekly—committees from each club are instructed to work diligently to have each member join the legionnaires, with the special privilege of receiving a subscription to that paper. There are going to be many angry, as well as heartsick, people when the realization comes home to them that they have spent their hard-earned money in the search for an imaginary pot of gold at the end of an illusionary rainbow.

Still they march on, by enthusiastic paid organizers led to believe that they will surely receive the sum of $200 each per month. The phrase, "a cruel hoax", should be employed more freely, now that it has been applied to the plan by certain outstanding figures in the world of economics, for its proposals cannot possibly stand up under the clear light of reason and common-sense analysis, despite the plausibility of all the fallacious arguments advanced in support of it.

In the time allotted to me it has, of course, been impossible to set forth all the negative points which can be made against the plan, or to make a full analysis of those which I have mentioned. Skilled economists and clear-thinking businessmen will do this, more and more, in the months to come, and it is my earnest hope that their statements and explanations will be read and carefully considered. Only by understanding fully both sides of an argument can a wise decision on its merits be reached. Certainly in this instance the mental processes of an impartial judge, rather than a biased advocate, are needed.

The worst feature and the greatest pity of this whole matter, in my opinion, is that all these recent social experiments and huge expenditures involved therein, have apparently instilled in all too many people the feeling that they should expect to be supported, without effort on their own part, by their Government—forgetting that it is, after all, only one phase of themselves. That the Government should be used as a means to take from 94 percent of its own citizenry—especially when it is not a case of taking from the rich to give to the poor but of taking from all classes, especially the laboring class—to give to 6 percent of the population is a sad commentary on the present morale of the Nation.

Still I would not impugn either the sincerity of most of the adherents of the Townsend plan, nor their belief that they are being patriotic in supporting it. I believe that the American flag always has a prominent place on the platform at the meetings of every club. Yet, in the present plight and serious situation of our Nation, is it really patriotism that moves their leaders to instruct every member of the organization to support as candidates for election to the Congress only men who are willing to espouse the Townsend plan, regardless of the party to which they may belong, regardless of their experience, qualifications, or principles; regardless of all else?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I mean this as a practical question. If these people are inspired by religious fervor, if they are impelled by evangelical motives, what, as a practical proposition, are you going to do if you cannot appeal to their reason? I understand the gentleman takes the position as I have stated. As a practical proposition, what are you going to—call out the Army and shoot them?

Mr. GIFFORD. I have faced audiences of 500 people—as many of you have. Yes; religious fervor was written on their countenances, particularly when a little girl on the platform rose and recited, "Won't grandma be happy when her pension comes?" Then some speaker said, "Wouldn't you like to take that trip to California you so long wanted to take?" I have sat for 2 hours and listened to that sort of thing being fed to them. Yes; religious fervor—sincerity on their faces, certainly. Some of the finest acquaintances I have sit in these audiences—former supporters of mine, who since have written me rather threatening letters.

They say, "Put the Congressman on the spot." Other politicians running for office flirt with them. They state that they are sympathetic with it—only because they are not to be placed "on the spot." But every one of those politicians that so sympathize weaken your stand. I have told business people, "When a Townsend club is organized in your particular district, interested and determined as its members are, you hesitate to say anything against it lest you would lose a sale of something." No, gentlemen; I want to say to you it is your burden. You are not going to be greatly assisted in argument in those communities where Townsend clubs are organized and mean business. It is your fight. They will never win, but a lot of new faces may come into this House, and many here may be replaced by men who have been selected on the strength of but one qualification—their support of this plan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The statement has been made that we are a nation of "economic illiterates", or that we are illiterate in economics. Can it be that the Townsend plan now gives the Members of Congress the opportunity to learn something about the fundamentals of economics and go out and preach that good gospel to the country, taking what may come to them as a result thereof?

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman is quite right. The gentleman knows that the entire first part of my address was a restrained address, acknowledging their sincerity and the absolute need for us to study these economics, because they have at least plausible reasons, and they have their economists who are advising them that the plan is feasible. I said a few moments ago that the plan would never succeed, but the Townsend Weekly tells its readers that the plan will actually pass this Congress. Is it a cruel hoax to tell them that?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Is it not true that the meetings are infinitely pathetic? These old people, over 60 years of age, are so sure that they are going to get that $200 a month, because their leaders assure them they will be successful, and they present a very pathetic picture. We could weep when we are at those meetings, because their cause seems so hopeless.

Mr. GIFFORD. I tried to draw that picture.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. In regard to being put on the spot by the people who favor the Townsend plan, is it not a fact that the Manufacturers' Association went on record, stating that they would go into the district of every Congressman who believed in the New Deal and do their utmost to defeat him?

Mr. GIFFORD. I have not heard of that.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. It was in the Pittsburgh papers.

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, they talk about big business. I represent a district the business of which I am proud of. I have only praise for them. We have to listen to these innuendoes, attempting to make it appear that all business is corrupt.

Mr. WOODRUM. Would the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman is making a most illuminating and interesting address. Apropos of the suggestion that our colleague made as to what to do about it, is this not true, that there are two completely separated extremes: one, the persistent resistance in some quarters of having the Federal Government not to do anything toward helping the needy, and the other, the attitude of people who want something that is unreasonable, uneconomic, and impossible? Is not the answer obviously this, and has not the President of the United States found the answer when he has given to the country a social-security program that is economically sound and that can be administered, and that will not bring down upon our heads the very institutions of government which we cherish? Is that not the answer to it?

Mr. GIFFORD. I said, "Let us try out the Social Security Act, for which I voted." However, the gentleman must not say that there is a large number of people in this country who do not want to extend any Federal aid. It is not so.

Mr. WOODRUM. Well, I think there are large sections of them who do not want any Federal aid. I stand by that statement. I do not attribute it to the gentleman, or to any particular political party perhaps, but I do think there is a large element that does not want to see the Federal Government do anything along the line of social legislation and help to the needy.

Mr. GIFFORD. I disagree with the gentleman.

Now I want to bring out one more point that I have not fully explained.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. GIFFORD. Do you understand that the Townsend plan has what they call legionnaires? When you ask them, "How do you get your money?" they say "25 cents a month, $3 a year; that is all." There are legionnaires in that great organization. When I told one of their organizers this, I showed him a receipt which read, "I herewith enclose my check for $12 for membership", and I asked, "What does that mean?" He said, "Those are legionnaires." Yes; they have a committee in every Townsend club telling them that if they are really enthusiastic and really want to help they should be legionnaires and add $12. The public ought to know these things.

I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. MONAGHAN. I should like to ask the gentleman how much he would want to have to pay his rent, his light, his heat, clothing, fuel, doctors, druggists, and dentists' bills?

Mr. GIFFORD. I have not figured that out; but no matter how much I have, labor will get practically all of it. No matter how much I am paid, I need all of it, because my manner of living will be based upon that salary, and labor would get it, directly or indirectly. I could adjust myself and go without dental and other similar services for a long time if I had to do so. In my younger days nobody could have done with less than I.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Does the gentleman advocate that for everybody in this country?

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman asked me a question. A number of statements on that subject have appeared in the Townsend Weekly. Suppose they were given $200 a month and labor costs went up to $10 a day; everything would rise in price and it would be impossible to estimate how much would be needed at any given time.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is the gentleman able to tell us any place on earth or any source on earth from which buying power can be obtained with which to pay wages, salaries, taxes, to buy drugs, clothing, shelter, or anything man uses, other than from the "stream of production"? Is there any other source from which to draw buying power?

Mr. GIFFORD. I have heard about printed money.

Mr. CRAWFORD. But printed money does not give buying power, because with printed money the very thing would happen which the gentleman just stated; prices would go up. If the gentleman from Massachusetts knows of any other source from which buying power can be secured other than the "stream of production", I hope he will include it in his statement at this particular point in the RECORD.

Mr. GIFFORD. I assume that it might be a difficult question to answer. The gentleman is suggesting, I take it, that a gift of $200 might bring about buying power, but he cannot tell the sort of stream we might find ourselves struggling in as the result of it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Certainly I do not want to be understood as suggesting that a gift of $200 will give the buying power. On the other hand, I want to repeat that I am firmly convinced there is no source from which buying power can come other than from production.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I want to close these remarks by making a statement as an appeal to my own people.

Personally, I cannot but believe that the constituency which it has been my privilege to represent and serve for the past 14 years, which lives in and near the original home of the sturdy, self-reliant Pilgrim Fathers, will eventually be impelled by conscience to give this subject the sort of honest consideration that I myself have given it—and which it needs. And I am sure that when the spell and allurement of the thought that there is a chance of their getting much for little or nothing has been broken, they will be guided by the hard common sense of our Pilgrim ancestors rather than by appeals to the emotion.

It is often a hard and a heartless thing to destroy a child's belief in a personal Santa Claus. But those who have come to man's estate must govern their behavior by reason, not fantasy. Dreams and visions—even fairy tales—have their proper place in this world; and splendid dreams are, indeed, the basis of many great social reforms and inventions benefiting humanity. But they must run with facts and reason, not contra to them, as in the present instance.

There is a saying that we sometimes have to be cruel in order to be kind. It seems plain to me that this is such a case. It is far better to be disillusioned early than too late. And if my own brief comments will help to persuade some believers in the Townsend fallacy to abandon it, and dissuade others from being captured by its fascinating and plausible—but fallacious—appeal, I shall feel that I have performed a worth-while service to my friends and neighbors who have been able to obtain little real information as to the glaring flaws in the scheme and the great danger to our Nation inherent in it.

Concluding, Mr. Chairman, I have often told my audiences that we have one splendid personality in the House of Representatives, whose very countenance radiates happiness, sincerity, and compassion for his fellow man. No man could have said more than I have said for my good friend the gentleman from California [Mr. MCGROARTY]. Of course, he is sincere. Of course, he wishes to be fair; and he wants now, I am sure, to look into this and find something that is workable. I do not believe for one moment that he now knows what plan will finally be presented.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GIFFORD. The answer that is now given by the proponents of this plan is that there were many soft spots in the original bill, but that they expect the details to be fixed up. My only comment is that if they fix up all the details of the bill, there would be little of real importance left. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW].

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a short bill I have introduced on the subject of neutrality.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, over the portals of the exquisite Greek temple on Capitol Hill that houses the United States Supreme Court there is emblazoned a legend that reads: "Equal Justice Under Law."

That legend beautifully symbolizes in four words the genius of American institutions. Ours is a government of law, upheld and sustained by the immortal principles of justice. I think the explanation of why our Government endures is found in this very fact that it is a government of law, embedded in principles of justice that are as visible, as immutable, and as everlasting as the eternal mountains.

When one reads with care the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution, and the Bill of Rights, and the various outstanding statutes of social justice that have been enacted during the 146 years of our national existence, he must conclude, if he be a fair-minded and discerning man, that the Government of the United States is self-justifying. It carries on its face its justification for immortality, for as long as men and women are ordained to live, afflicted by the ills that flesh is heir to and actuated by the hopes and aspirations of the human race, our Government and its institutions will be beneficently adapted to their needs.

The admitted primacy of our Government among the governments of the world in its adaptation to the needs of the common people, the brilliant success that has attended this experiment of establishing a free and independent nation in the Western Hemisphere, suggest that we should proceed slowly and exercise the utmost care in framing a permanent neutrality law, on which may depend in no small degree the future security of the Republic.

The policy that has made our Nation great—the policy that is so graphically expressed on the Supreme Court's portals by the phrase "Equal Justice Under Law"—should be the cornerstone of our neutrality policy. Our neutrality policy should be a policy that is founded on law and not a policy that will shift like a shuttlecock with the ever-changing and changeable views of an endless procession of Presidents in the White House.

I plead for a neutrality policy based on law and against a neutrality policy based on the opinions or the whim of the President who may be occupying the White House when trouble arises.

I stand for a mandatory neutrality law with teeth in it, and with all of my soul I stand against the proposal now being advanced by a number of very worthy and eminent persons who seem to think that the final determination of America's neutrality policy, with the right to perform acts or to withhold acts that are intimately connected with the delicate mechanism of war, should be left to the discretion of the President of the United States.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I have only a little time, but I gladly yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I wish to ask a very brief question only, and that is whether the gentleman subscribes—and I imagine he does—to the policy of our first President as outlined in his Farewell Address?

Mr. LUDLOW. The gentleman is correct. I certainly do. I shall refer to that later.

I assert that law—the carefully and deliberately written legislative product of many minds, who think as they pray, and pray as they think—should govern in this matter, and not the judgment of one man who will be called upon to act, not amid surroundings that invite deliberation, but after trouble comes, to act in unforeseen and difficult situations on the spur of the moment as exigencies arise.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT BREATHES THE SPIRIT OF THE MASSES

In standing for a mandatory neutrality law I do not abate one jot or tittle my admiration for the man now in the White House. No more consecrated patriot ever occupied the Presidential chair. For him I have the utmost admiration and respect, because I know his heart is always true and that no less than Jefferson and Jackson and Lincoln he is a friend of the masses of humanity. President Roosevelt is a peace-loving man, thank the Lord, and is passionately dedicated to the task of keeping America out of war, but the additional years he probably will have in the White House will be but as one tick of the clock in the life of a nation.

Suppose some one of his successors in the years to come should be a dictator of the stripe of Napoleon with a flair for war. Into what dangers might he not lead us, if we clothe him with the discretionary power to direct an embargo against one nation and to withhold it from another and to issue all the other orders which are implied in discretionary neutrality legislation—orders any one of which may hold the fate of peace or war. As far as our responsibilities in framing this legislation are concerned, President Roosevelt may be considered entirely out of the picture. We are about to frame a permanent neutrality law; one that will last for all time. At least that is the solemn task to which we say we have dedicated ourselves.

In my long career as a newspaper correspondent in the press gallery up yonder it has been my fortune to know, rather intimately I think, all of the Presidents of the United States from Benjamin Harrison down to Franklin D. Roosevelt. For all of them I cannot express the same faith I have in our present Executive. I have known some Presidents—one especially—whom I would not trust for a moment with such a broad exercise of power as is contemplated in this proposed discretionary neutrality legislation. Who can assure us that we shall not some time in the future have a President who will take advantage of this tremendous power to gratify his militaristic inclinations?

LET ALL NATIONS BEHOLD OUR NEUTRALITY POLICY

I am in favor of mandatory neutrality legislation in the most definite terms, in black and white, and given the most widespread publicity, so that all nations may behold it. I would have such a law on the statute books so that any nation with designs on waging war will be put on notice in advance exactly what America's position will be if it starts a conflict.

I am supporting mandatory neutrality legislation because I believe it would be conducive to the future peace and tranquillity of America, and I am opposing discretionary neutrality legislation because I believe it would be a prolific cause of strife and turmoil, with a constant tendency to drag our country into delicate international situations and to the verge of war if not into real conflict. To illustrate the dangers of discretionary neutrality legislation, take the case of oil. If Congress at the last session had had the foresight to impose a mandatory embargo on war supplies and materials, including oil, as well as on munitions and implements of war, such as was proposed in the excellent neutrality bill introduced by that gallant veteran, Representative MAURY MAVERICK, of Texas, a dangerous situation would have been averted. Italy and Ethiopia would then have been put on notice that if they should go to war all oil supplies from America would automatically be cut off at the beginning of hostilities. There would be nothing about that to give offense to any nation.

But unfortunately oil was not banned, and now let us see what would happen if the President were given the discretionary authority to impose an embargo on oil. With oil so vital to Italy, being the key to the successful prosecution of her war in Ethiopia, it would be natural to expect that the most intense pressure would be brought to bear on the President by Italy and her friends to induce him to withhold an embargo on oil, while Great Britain and her allies would be just as zealous in persuading him to declare the embargo. This would be likely to create an international hullaballoo of the first magnitude. The White House at Washington would become the world's storm center, and there would be imminent danger of America being dragged into the most serious international complications, if not into actual war, all of which might have been happily avoided if Congress had had the vision to enact a mandatory neutrality law covering supplies and materials useful in promoting war, as well as munitions of war.

If we are to give to every future President authority to juggle with these serious and delicate international situations, then, of course, we must expect that every President will have his agents abroad mixing in the affairs of foreign lands, so as to keep him advised when to strike and when not to strike, and soon we shall have a trouble squad intermeddling with world problems that will utterly belie the sound advice given by the Father of his Country when he admonished us to keep out of all foreign entanglements. This Congress, if it be true to America, will not permit such tinkering and experimentation with world nerve centers when the possibility—nay, the virtual certainty—is that it will bring tragic involvements in world strife.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman one moment at this time?

Mr. LUDLOW. Yes.

Mr. LUNDEEN. The gentleman spoke of a referendum on war. I conducted the first congressional referendum on war that was ever held. I should like to tell the gentleman what happened to me someday when we have time.

Mr. LUDLOW. I should be glad to have the gentleman tell me about it.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I have not time now.

Mr. LUDLOW. I may say to my friend from Minnesota that I have introduced in this Congress a resolution for a referendum on war which I sincerely hope may receive favorable consideration later on.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. LUDLOW. Yes.

Mr. STEFAN. If we lent money to Italy right now, would this, in the gentleman's judgment, get us into war?

Mr. LUDLOW. With the utmost respect to the gentleman from Nebraska, how can I answer that any better than the gentleman himself? It is a pure guess. I do not know.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 additional minutes to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I think the solution of our neutrality problem would be simplified if we would remember that we are not responsible for anybody's wickedness outside of the United States; that the sins of the world are not on our shoulders, and that there is no call for us to set ourselves up as an international umpire to pass judgment on every foreign quarrel.

I do not believe this country ever had a President with a higher idealism or a more accurate conception of our international relationships than that splendid Christian gentleman and statesman, Benjamin Harrison, of Indiana. And to me, a youthful newspaper reporter long ago, he uttered a sentiment that has rung in my ears ever since, when he said, "We have no commission from God to police the world."

In my opinion that sententious utterance is entitled to a place in historical literature along with the immortal admonition of President Washington against entangling alliances. [Applause.]

We who in this Chamber sit in judgment on the text of a permanent neutrality law must remember that we are the guardians of posterity. Upon the faithfulness of our performance here, as measured by the Republic's traditional ideals of friendliness and service, rests in no small degree the future peace of America. In the momentous hour when we shall vote on this bill we must not be faithless to Washington. [Applause.]

From out of the background of history comes his majestic figure to warn us that this is to be a real test—a historic test—of the measure of our devotion to his immortal advice to us to keep free from foreign entanglements.

We must not deliberately by statute set up the President of the United States as an arbiter to mix in every foreign quarrel. If we pass discretionary neutrality legislation, we will be handing a dangerous weapon to every future President of the United States without knowing when he will shoot or what he will shoot at. The Congress must not do that. It must have more respect for the masses who have to suffer and die in war than to authorize such experimentation.

It must have more respect than that for the wives and mothers, who are always the worst sufferers in war. Let us not mistake the issue. If we give to every future President sweeping power to declare embargoes and to control the shipment of materials of war, we will be giving him what is tantamount to the power to declare war. I am one of those who believe that instead of further centralizing the war-making power we should decentralize it by handing it to the people themselves, to be exercised in a popular referendum. [Applause.]

DISCRETIONARY LEGISLATION WILL FRIGHTFULLY EXPOSE AMERICA TO WAR

If discretionary neutrality legislation is enacted and the President is authorized and instructed to impose and to withhold embargoes ad libitum—to specify what exports shall be banned and what exports shall be allowed, what nations are blameless and what nations are aggressors—it will inevitably lead America into the most ticklish and hair-trigger international situations and will frightfully expose this country to war.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield.

Mr. HEALEY. The gentleman is making a very splendid speech on this important subject, and it shows he has given a great deal of thought and consideration to it.

I should like to ask the gentleman if, in his opinion, it is wise at this time to further amplify the neutrality bill which the Congress passed at the last session by including other articles than those specified in that legislation?

Mr. LUDLOW. I may say to the gentleman I certainly do. I would create by law an absolute mandatory embargo against loans, credits, and goods of all kinds if I were writing the new neutrality statute.

Mr. HEALEY. Does not the gentleman think that embargoing any of those articles to such an extent as to work adversely to one of the belligerents would be an unneutral act toward that belligerent?

Mr. LUDLOW. I think if we attempt to decide on a permanent neutrality law, and it is understood by all the nations that this is our purpose, it will be accepted by the world as not being aimed at any particular nation. It would be simply a determination of our future policy, the policy which is to rest permanently on our statute books, and the world would so understand. I do not anticipate any complications such as my friend has in mind.

As I was saying before I yielded to my friend from Massachusetts, if discretionary neutrality legislation is enacted, threats will be made and strings will be pulled to induce the President to take this course or to refrain from taking that course. The President will be a target of all of the diabolism and chicanery known to international intrigue. When the storm clouds are thickest and vital issues hinge on the President's action the leading topic in every chancelry on earth will be, "What will America do?"

In that tense atmosphere it is possible, if not probable, that the President's action, whatever it may be, will involve us in war.

Gentlemen of the Committee, if you desire, as I know you do, to heed the cry of distressed and long-suffering America for protection from foreign wars, you should pass a strong mandatory neutrality law; but if you want—God forbid!—to sow the seeds of war, the way to do that is to pass a discretionary neutrality law directing the President and every future President to tinker with international situations by issuing embargoes against some nations and withholding embargoes from others, designating "aggressor nations", and all that kind of dangerous adventure in unknown fields.

THIS IS THE LAW

We should not take any such chances. We should remove in advance all doubt as to what America will do, and this we can easily accomplish by passing a mandatory neutrality law of broad scope and definite provisions, leaving nothing to the future or to imagination or to chance.

We can then say to every nation on earth: "This is the law. Read it and you will know exactly what America will do."

This is the frank, honest, aboveboard way of dealing with the question of neutrality. It gets rid of secret, tricky diplomacy that has brought many governments to the brink of ruin. It is the way that offers to America the greatest measure of insurance against world involvement. It is the way of peace and tranquillity.

PROPOSED PRINCIPLES OF NEUTRALITY

I have introduced a bill which I believe embodies the essential principles of a desirable permanent, mandatory neutrality law.

I should like to bring to the attention of the House and the country the principles of neutrality which I propose, and by unanimous consent I present them as a part of my remarks, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon the outbreak of war between two or more foreign nations the President shall issue a proclamation forbidding (1) exports of all kinds and (2) loans and credits to said belligerent countries or to the nationals of said belligerent countries. Said prohibition shall be made effective in a similar way by proclamation against nations that may enter the war subsequent to its outbreak and the nationals of said nations.

SEC. 2. The penalty for violating such proclamation shall be a fine of $10,000 or imprisonment not more than 5 years, or both.

SEC. 3. No vessel of American registry shall be chartered or used to transport goods in violation of the President's proclamation forbidding said shipments, and the penalty for violation of this section shall be cancelation of the registration of said vessel.

SEC. 4. Upon the outbreak of war between two or more foreign nations the President shall issue a proclamation notifying American citizens that travel on the vessels of belligerent nations shall be at the traveler's own risk: Provided, That the notification shall not apply to a citizen on a voyage begun in advance of the date of the President's proclamation, if he has had no opportunity to discontinue his voyage after that date.

SEC. 5. Whenever during a war between two or more foreign nations it shall come to the notice of the Secretary of Labor that any alien is engaged in the United States or any possession thereof in propaganda activities other than the legitimate exercise of free speech and by such activities is seeking to win the favor of the United States for one or more of the belligerents, or otherwise to interfere with the position of neutrality of the United States, the Secretary shall immediately order the arrest of said alien and shall as soon as practicable deport him to the country from which he came.

SEC. 6. Recruiting in the United States in behalf of any belligerent foreign nation is forbidden. The penalty for violating this section shall be a fine of $10,000 or imprisonment not more than 5 years, or both.

SEC. 7. Whoever (1) disguises the identity of a consignor or (2) camouflages the nature or the destination of goods intended for ultimate delivery to a belligerent nation or to nationals of a belligerent nation shall be subject to a fine of $10,000 or imprisonment not more than 5 years, or both.

WOULD MAKE UNITED STATES ABSOLUTELY NEUTRAL

My bill would make the United States an absolutely neutral Nation in any foreign war. It would do this primarily by stopping all trade, loans, and credits with foreign countries simultaneously upon the entrance of those countries into war. It would deport aliens who come here to arouse our passions and prejudices in support of belligerents if their anti-American activities go beyond the constitutional right of free speech, as has glaringly happened in the past. It would prohibit recruiting for foreign armies on American soil, and it would reach those culprits who seek to escape the condemnation of public opinion and at the same time to evade legal responsibility by listing shipments of war supplies to foreign powers under alien names.

Mr. TERRY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. TERRY. The gentleman in his bill seeks to prohibit all trade with belligerent nations.

Mr. LUDLOW. That is correct.

Mr. TERRY. The so-called administration bill, I believe, provides that there may not be exported goods above the average of, say, the last 5 years. Will the gentleman discuss that situation a moment?

Mr. LUDLOW. I may say to the gentleman that I have not had time to study the different bills which have been presented. I am not now trying to speak in favor of any bill or to oppose any bill, but I am trying to lay down what I conceive to be certain sound principles of neutrality without reference to any particular measure. I think it is proper and appropriate that attention should be called to these matters at the present time, before we begin to legislate on this vital subject. In further answer to the gentleman's question, I may say that I am approaching in my statement the matter he has in mind.

Seek as we may to compromise the issue, there is but one way the neutrality of America may be guaranteed, and that is to break off trade and commercial relations entirely with foreign countries at war.

With others who are earnestly interested in this subject, I have given much thought to the proposal to hold our trade and loans to normal quotas after war breaks out; but it will not work. Suppose, for instance, that a foreign nation in peacetime receives a million barrels of oil from the United States for domestic peacetime requirements in its industries. If that nation goes to war and we continue to send to it 1,000,000 barrels of oil per annum, that oil will not go into peaceful uses. It will, of course, be seized by the government for war purposes, and to that extent we shall be aiding that government to prosecute its war, which would make us in fact unneutral, although on the face of things we might still appear neutral. I only cite oil as an example. The same facts would apply to practically all other articles that enter into international commerce, for there is hardly any article that may not be diverted to war uses.

The language of the existing weak neutrality law, confining embargoes to "munitions and implements of war", is a gruesome joke. Foodstuffs, oil, cotton, copper, and a variety of raw materials are just as essential to a nation bent on waging war as are the shipments which are narrowly described in our present abortive neutrality statute as "munitions." All of these things must be banned if we are to be truly neutral.

WE CANNOT BE BOTH NEUTRAL AND ACCESSORY TO WARS

There is but one way to be neutral, and that is to be neutral. We cannot be both neutral and accessory to war at the same time. The only way to protect America's neutral position in the world is to cut off all trade and all financial transactions with warring nations. There will be some, of course, who will lament the loss of trade, but I ask them, What does that amount to when we weigh it against the lives of our young manhood and the terrible burdens of cost incident to our possible involvement in war?

To those whose imagination does not rise above such base considerations, let me make this statement:

One of our fine American boys, your son or my son, or somebody else's son, is worth more than all of the wealth of the world combined.

The hand of destiny points the way clearly if we have the vision to see it. Our role in history should be that of a good neighbor, but to be a good neighbor we do not need to rush to every international fire. By remaining at home and minding our own business, cultivating the arts of peace, and showing once more some regard for the neglected spiritual values, keeping our ears deaf to the tocsin of war, but attuned always to the call of humanity, we can show the nations by precept and example the real meaning of the phrase "good neighbor" and can best fulfill our high mission in the world. [Applause.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I have not the time to speak on the state of the Union or on the state of propaganda or class hatred or state socialism this afternoon. Neither have I the time to talk on that fictitious or political budget which Al Smith would call a "baloney" or "phoney" budget that the President sent to Congress a few days ago. It refers to the approaching balancing of the Budget when approximately $2,000,000,000 needed for relief and $500,000,000 more for processing taxes were not included. Later on I will speak in detail on the Budget and take up the President's challenge to show what New Deal measures should be repealed.

I have risen for the purpose of making some observations and brief comments on the so-called Jacksonian dinner to be held in Washington and in other cities this evening.

The New Dealers, with the approval of the President, have arranged a huge dinner tonight at the Mayflower Hotel at Washington to celebrate Jackson's birthday at the cost of $50 per plate. Is it quite fair to use Andrew Jackson, that fearless and uncompromising champion of the Constitution, at a time when the New Deal "brain trust" like a lot of termites are endeavoring to undermine and destroy our Constitution at every opportunity?

I am reminded of the fifth chapter of the Book of Daniel, the first verse of which reads as follows: "Belshazzar the king made a great feast to a thousand of his lords, and drank wine before the thousand." In the midst of this extravagant, luxurious, and golden feast a handwriting unknown even to the royal magicians and "brain trusters" of those days troubled and alarmed the king. "And this is the writing that was written, 'Mene, mene, tekel, upharsin.'" The interpretation thereof, paraphrased to apply to modern conditions—the New Deal Democracy and the $50-a-plate "Rooseveltian dinner"—is "mene", the people have numbered thy kingdom and will end it; "tekel", thou art weighed in the balances and art found wanting; "upharsin", thy kingdom is divided and will be given to the Republicans with the aid of deceived and disgusted Jacksonian and Jeffersonian Democrats. [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to my colleague from New York.

Mr. TABER. Does the gentleman suppose that perhaps the reason they asked $50 a plate for the dinner was that so many of these $100-a-month fellows have been getting $5,000 a year?

Mr. FISH. Yes; and I think they have their orders to put up or get out, if that is what the gentleman means to infer.

How the party of Bryan, Champ Clark, Tom Marshall, Al Smith, Woodrow Wilson, Jackson, and Jefferson has fallen. It will be interesting to read the list of monopolists, millionaires, autocrats, and greedy seekers of special favors from the New Deal who will attend this Lucullan feast and gala social event of the New Deal to fill the campaign chest in an attempt to reelect Franklin "Deficit" Roosevelt. What sanctimonious hypocrisy about driving the money changers from the temple. Using the words of the President in his Atlanta speech, what about the steam-heated luxurious banquet hall in the Mayflower Hotel, with the tables covered with choicest wines and Corona and Coronation cigars? What is sauce for the Democratic goose is sauce for the Republican gander. It would be just as well if the President would withhold his obsessions against those who have any money left and remember that he likewise belongs to the same comfortable clubs and smokes the same expensive cigars. We have already had too much class arrayed against class for the best interests of the country. It may be good politics, but it is poor Americanism, and I am not so sure it is good politics, because sooner or later the American people will see through and resent the efforts of the administration to promote and incite class hatred in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD, and to include therein certain excerpts.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, in his earlier days our colleague from New York, Mr. FISH, was a most valuable citizen. We all remember that in the Harvard line he was an incomparable end, valiant and faithful at all times.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry, but I cannot at this time.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Just to correct a statement.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, to be exact, he was an incomparable football tackle in the Harvard line. During the war he was a valiant soldier and a valuable officer on the field of battle. I take my hat off to him for that service.

But during the last few years, since political partisanship has possessed him, and especially since a little bee has begun buzzing in his bonnet, all of his usefulness has departed.

Now he is continually, from one side of the United States to the other, wherever he can get an audience, belittling the administration for political purposes. He talks about the Jacksonian dinner at $50 a plate. Trouble in raising necessary campaign funds has always been the history of the Democratic Party. It has never given big hand-outs of special favor and privilege to big business. Naturally, it cannot get big campaign contributions like my friend's organization can. When Republicans need money to finance their campaigns they send out little messages to their rich angels and the money comes in at $50,000 a whack. [Laughter and applause.] Fifty-thousand-dollar contributions to Republicans come when they are necessary. We Democrats get ours from small contributions from small Democrats. There will be Democratic banquets all over the United States tonight, and the charge per plate will be nominal at most of them. In my home city of Abilene, Tex., there will be a banquet tonight, and the charge will be only $2 per person.

At the outset I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that, except as to the repeal of national prohibition, which repeal has been a curse to our Nation, I am heartily in favor of carrying out to the letter every pledge we Democrats made in our national Democratic platform of 1932. I am in favor of strict economy in all governmental expenses. I am in favor of abolishing every useless and unnecessary bureau, independent office, and commission. I am strictly in favor of State rights. The States do not need any dictation from an army of arrogant Federal agents. I am heartily in favor of a National Budget. I am in favor of balancing our Budget. I am in favor of keeping it balanced. I am in favor of preserving our Constitution. And I am in favor of defending it against all enemies, foreign and domestic. And I am in favor of preserving our Supreme Court of the United States and am against hampering it in any way in its right and duty to interpret and uphold the Constitution.

While I have not agreed with all of the proposals made by our administration, I have felt that the President was entitled to have a chance to put into operation his policies for economic recovery, and I have gone along with him and supported his program except in instances where I had made contrary pledges to my constituents when they elected me.

After the President of the United States has honestly and conscientiously done everything within his power to relieve the distressed people of the country, I cannot understand how any fair-minded citizen could heap upon him abuse and attack.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] spoke about the handwriting on the wall at Belshazzar's feast. Everyone knows that his reference was wholly inapplicable to our administration. I want to show you the real handwriting on the wall. It appears in a Republican newspaper, the Washington Post, which is the new mouthpiece of the Republican Party in Washington, owned by Eugene Meyer, the new spokesman of the Republican organization in our Nation's Capital. I will not quote from any Democratic newspaper, because Republicans then might charge that the evidence was colored and partisan. But I will quote from their own Republican organ, the Washington Post, so that no Republican should question the handwriting.

Before doing so, however, I want to mention that concerning President Roosevelt's address Friday night to the joint session of Congress, on its front page Saturday morning, January 4, 1936, the Washington Post said:

> It was virtually barren of recommendations. * * * He made no effort to cite figures to show the economic improvement of the country. * * * He became a political orator, throwing force and appeal into his voice and resorting to histrionics to make his points. His tone was belligerent and fighting.
> The Republicans sat in silence, some in apparently sullen silence. * * * But a few minutes later the Republicans, who were not getting the spirit of the meeting, broke into raucous laughter. * * * Their laughter at the President's expense was unusual if not unprecedented. Mr. Roosevelt's face was grim, and a number of persons frowned.

Both the Washington Post and its publisher, Mr. Eugene Meyer, knew that it was unnecessary for the President "to cite figures to show the economic improvement of the country", because Eugene's Washington Post had done that very thing the day preceding the President's address, and the figures the Washington Post on said January 2, 1936, then cited forms the real handwriting on the wall. I will now quote some from the Washington Post, issue of January 2, 1936, the following statement from Hon. Robert V. Fleming, one of the leading citizens of Washington, D. C., and one of the greatest bankers in the United States and one of the greatest financiers and businessmen of the country. Here is what Mr. Fleming says on this main page of the Washington Post that I hold up before you, and he is president of the Riggs National Bank and president of the American Bankers' Association:

> As the year 1935 closes there is unquestionably prevalent among the people generally and among businessmen in the retail trade particularly a conviction that the Nation is definitely on the way out of the depression toward a return to normal business activity.

There is some of the real handwriting on the wall that hurts our former Harvard tackle. [Laughter.]

Regarding our administration's new Banking Act, here is what this great banker, Robert V. Fleming, says:

We have ample evidence of a complete restoration of public confidence in banking.

Is not that accomplishment almost a miracle? Why, on March 4, 1933, when President Franklin D. Roosevelt took the oath of office, banks everywhere over the country, both National and State, had closed their doors and thereby wiped out overnight the life's savings of hundreds of thousands of citizens everywhere. The people had lost confidence in banks. In the city of Eastland, in my district, all four banks had closed and not a bank was left to handle the people's business, notwithstanding that Eastland is a county seat with two district courts and a court of appeals there in session regularly.

Now Mr. Robert V. Fleming says that "we have ample evidence of a complete restoration of public confidence in banking."

What has brought about this miracle since the gloomy days of March 1933? It was our President and his administration, which you Republicans are now continually sniping. One of the first things President Roosevelt did after he took charge of this Government was to take over the banking of the country, and he closed up all of the banks until he could find out which were solvent, and he let only those reopen that could furnish security to the people who had their money on deposit with them, and he made them guarantee their deposits; and now the great banker of the Nation's Capital says there has been a complete restoration of confidence in banking since the administration has brought this about. [Applause.]

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment. I always yield to my friend from Massachusetts, and I will yield in just a moment; but I do not want my time to expire before I have finished my statement.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. The gentleman will yield, then, after his time has expired?

Mr. BLANTON. I will yield for a question before I conclude. Here is what Roger W. Babson says. Many businessmen pay about $15 to get Babson's reports on financial institutions. Your big financiers, who, instead of contributing $50 to a Democratic Jackson Day dinner, sometimes give $50,000 contributions to the Republican chest, think they must have these Babson reports. This is from Roger W. Babson, from the Washington Post of January 2, 1936:

I am bullish on business for 1936. Not on any year-end since the late twenties have I felt surer than I do today that plans could be laid on the basis of better business during the coming 12 months.

"Regardless of the elections"—regardless of whether they put Ham in with BORAH or somebody else—"regardless of the elections", he says, "the tide of business is running in and nothing can stop it." I quote him further:

When we check up on this forecast next December, I am convinced that we shall find satisfactory gains in jobs, wages, sales and advertising, stocks, farm incomes, earnings, and dividends. This, of course, would be but a continuation of the current trend. Business has been moving steadily forward during most of this year—the pace quickening as the holidays approached. The immediate outlook is satisfactory, and I forecast about an 8-percent gain for the first half of 1936 over the same period of 1935.

That is from Roger W. Babson. That is a part of the handwriting on the wall.

Now, let me quote further from this issue of the Washington Post. Marcus Nadler, research director of the Institute of International Finance and professor of finance of New York University, states on this front page:

The United States now holds 45 percent of the world's total monetary gold—

And goes on to show that this is a sign of improvement and stability for the country. He says:

During the period from the passage of the Gold Reserve Act on January 30, 1934, to the end of November 1935, net imports of gold into the United States amounted to $2,685,700,000, a record for any similar period in financial history.

Let me read you from this Republican Washington Post what John T. Madden, dean of the school of commerce accounts and finance of New York University, says:

Prospects for new financing during 1936 are definitely the best since 1929. Not only is there promise of a continued large volume of refunding issues but a material increase in the number of flotations designed to raise new long-term capital for industry is also in prospect.

That is the real mene, mene, tekel, upharsin that confronts our friend from New York. [Laughter.]

Let me quote from the next page of this Washington Post for January 2, 1936. J. J. Pelley, president of the Association of American Railroads, says:

Railroad traffic, both freight and passenger, and net railway-operating income, were greater in 1935 than in any year since 1931.

Loading of revenue freight during the past calendar year totaled 31,450,000 cars, an increase of 603,000 cars, or 1.95 percent above 1934 and an increase of 2,230,000 cars, or 7.63 percent above 1933. It also was an increase of 3,270,000 cars, or 11.6 percent, above 1932.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Has the gentleman got the same data for March 2, 1933?

Mr. BLANTON. I have not all of it at this time, but I am going to get it if I have time, and you will see the difference in the situation.

Now, I want to quote what Lawrence B. Mann, commodity economist from New York, said in this Washington Post on January 2, 1936:

Commodity prices exhibited very general strength during 1935 and their average advance to the highest level in 5 years.

Now let us turn over to the next page. Oh, this Republican newspaper is full of these handwritings. [Laughter.]

Here is what Lewis M. Hewlett, president of the Washington Association of Credit Men, says:

Collections in wholesale and building-supply lines in Washington have certainly been much improved in 1935. Arising out of the general business improvement is the payment of many old accounts accumulated 3 or 4 years back.

That is some more of the handwriting.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Just a moment. Now, I quote from Mr. J. E. McCombs, president of the District of Columbia Life Underwriters Association. He says, in this Washington Post, on January 2, 1936:

As the clouds of the most widespread, devastating depression of all history are being rolled away by the fresh winds of recovery, the sunshine reveals that this great financial institution has * * * raised its pinnacle still further toward the sun.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Just a moment, please. I want to give my friend from New York something real to tackle in his next perforation he delivers before the American people.

Now, I quote from William Montgomery, president of the Acacia Mutual Life Insurance Co., from page 3, Washington Post, January 2, 1936. He says:

* * * The forces of recovery have asserted themselves vigorously during the past year, and the general economic situation in the United States has seemingly materially improved.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Texas 10 minutes more.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. BLANTON. Just a moment. I quote now from John L. Weaver, past president of the National Association of Real Estate Boards, in Washington Post, January 2, 1936. He says:

We have emerged from our most recent depression, as we did from many in the past. During 1935 the real-estate industry enjoyed a substantial measure of recovery throughout the country.

I quote now from Frank McMillan, the Associated Press financial writer, in the Washington Post, January 2, 1936. Here is what he says:

NEW YORK, January 1.—As Wall Street prepared to write finis to the best stock-market year since prices began to struggle out from the depression depths of 1932, the general share price level was back to the marks last scored more than 4 years ago.

I now quote from Mr. Waverly Taylor, director, National Association of Real Estate Boards, from this Washington Post of January 2, 1936. Here is what he says:

The year 1935 will go down in real-estate history as the beginning of the upswing from depression depths. Every phase of real estate throughout the length and breadth of our land has shown substantial improvement, and the upward trend is now definite, steady, and strong.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. As I promised her I would do, I first yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] for a question only.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Will the Jackson Day diners have a moment of silence for the dead—the alphabetical writing on the wall?

Mr. BLANTON. We have already celebrated that sad rite, because we paused time and time again for the Republican dead that are in the Republican Party who, figuratively speaking, died when the great Democratic administration took over this Government in behalf of the people of the United States.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. But they are still in the game.

Mr. BLANTON. Now I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. ENGEL. The gentleman has been quoting from the Washington Post?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; admissions from a Republican newspaper.

Mr. ENGEL. Has the gentleman changed his mind regarding the authenticity of the Post?

Mr. BLANTON. Not at all as to its editor. I want to say this——

Mr. ENGEL. I call the attention of the gentleman to what he said on the floor——

Mr. BLANTON. I regret that I cannot yield further. I have read these comments in this Republican newspaper that come from the financial leaders all over this country showing that the depression is behind it and that we are on the uplift back to recovery.

Mr. ENGEL. On April 25, 1935——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield for that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas declines to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Anything that the gentleman from Michigan wants to say derrogatory to Mr. Eugene Meyer I shall back up 100 percent. He cannot say anything too bad about him to which I will not subscribe.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am quoting news items in the way of admissions from his newspaper.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I am sorry. These are news items that he could not color. He colors most of them. Everything he prints about me he colors to suit himself. These are from big outstanding men of finance in this country whose statements he could not color.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I regret that I cannot yield further. I now quote from James E. Colliflower, president of the Merchants and Manufacturers Association of Washington, in this Washington Post of January 2, 1936:

Business conditions in Washington have shown marked improvement during the past few months. In many lines of business this year, 1935, has been the best in several years, exceeding all expectations. In the retail field department stores in this city report an increase in business of 15.7 percent for the first 11 months of this year, as compared to last year. * * * Retail business in Washington for November showed an even greater increase, being 19.5 percent above November of last year. Bank clearings in Washington in recent months have shown an increase of from 25 to 30 percent over the corresponding periods last year. Postal receipts in the District have likewise shown marked increases over the corresponding months of last year.

The year 1935 is proving to be the best year in the history of the automobile business in Washington, exceeding even the boom year of 1929 by 20 percent. A total of 24,456 new cars were sold the first 10 months of this year as compared to 17,057 during the same period last year.

The total net registration of automobiles in the District of Columbia during the current year is about 178,000, which represents an increase of 11,000 over 1934.

The telephone company in November, for the first time in its history, passed the 200,000 mark in telephone installations. Oil-burner sales in Washington have also increased from 3,000 in 1934 to about 5,000 in 1935.

The foregoing facts are indicative that business in many lines in Washington is definitely better than it has been during the past few years.

I now quote from Mr. E. F. Middleton, president of the Washington Real Estate Board, in this Washington Post, January 2, 1936. He says:

In every phase of local business a noticeable improvement has taken place. The real-estate market has assumed its normal, healthy condition, and from all indications is very definitely on the upward trend.

I now quote from Mr. Thomas M. Cahill, the real-estate editor for the Nation's Capital, under big headlines, "Building costs in Washington exceed $116,000,000", from this Washington Post of January 2, 1936. He said:

BUILDING COSTS IN WASHINGTON TO EXCEED $116,000,000

Federal, municipal, and private construction in and near the District of Columbia during 1935 and in 1936 will reach a total value of more than $116,900,000. In the year just closed permits for private and municipal projects representing in actual value more than $24,702,000 were issued by the office of the District building inspector. Private construction in the District alone reaches a total of more than $19,993,000, a gain of more than $11,000,000 over that of 1934.

I quote now from Mr. Charles H. Doing, president of the District of Columbia Bankers Association, from this Washington Post of January 2, 1936, to wit:

No better business barometer can be found than the monthly totals of checks passing through the local clearing house since they constitute not less than 90 percent of the city's financial transactions. Comparing the total for 1934 with that of the year just ended, we find a business expansion of 21.6 percent, a most encouraging indication for the District.

From this same Washington Post of January 2, 1936, I quote the following:

WESTERN ELECTRIC SALES EXCEED $104,000,000

NEW YORK, January 1.—Edgar S. Bloom, president of Western Electric Co., manufacturing subsidiary of American Telephone & Telegraph Co., said yesterday the company's 1935 sales will exceed $104,000,000, against $91,807,000 for 1934.

As a result of this increase in operations the company, he said, reengaged many former employees.

It is well known that postal receipts are a fair barometer of the condition of business over the country. In the Sweetwater Daily Reporter, published in the city of Sweetwater, down in my Texas district, there are big headlines on the front page telling about the postal receipts having increased in 1935 over 1934, showing a substantial increase in postal receipts there. I note from the Cisco daily paper that postal receipts in Cisco, Tex., have increased. Talk about the handwriting on the wall! I want my distinguished friend from New York to ask the corn farmers in Illinois and Iowa, the Republican corn farmers, what they think about the price of corn as compared with the price at which it was sold—which did not even pay for the cost of raising it—when the gentleman's party gave up its hold on this Government. Ask the wheat farmers about it. Ask the hog farmers about it all over the West. Ask the cattle raisers what they think. Ask the Republican farmers how they feel about the present situation and they will say, "My dear Mr. Tentative Candidate for Vice President on the Republican or Bull Moose Ticket", or whatever it may be [laughter], "we much appreciate and are in love with the situation now compared to what it was when you left the handling of this Government to the Democrats." [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. When the gentleman from New York gets political and runs for Vice President he is out of his sphere of usefulness. He is not running true to form. Why does he not let this rank politics alone? He really is a valuable legislator. He is very helpful legislatively to you Republicans. You are just using him now for a pinch hitter, putting him up here for these attacks and tackles. Why do you not take him out of this political wrangle and put him back where he belongs? [Laughter.] He is a valuable legislator.

I say to him that when this administration took hold of this Government the farmers of the United States had no organization whatever nationally. That is what has been the matter with them. They could not get together on a national organization. Every other great interest in the country has a national organization, but the farmers did not have it. This Government has tried to do something for the farmers. I do not approve of many things that Henry Wallace has done. He has filled my district with Republicans from Iowa and from all over the West. [Laughter.] He has an army of them down there. That is one of the bad things he has done. [Laughter.] But this administration has done something for the farmer. The cotton farmers in this country formerly could not sell their cotton for enough to pay for picking it. Now it is worth 10 or 11 cents a pound on the market. It is the first time that the farmers of the United States have had even a bare look-in on Government operation in Washington. But they are thankful to the Democratic administration for what it has done for them. [Applause.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, it is always a pleasure to listen to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], because when he wants to give us something good he always quotes a reliable authority.

Mr. ENGEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield.

Mr. ENGEL. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] quoted at length from the Washington Post. I just want to call attention to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 25, 1935, page 6397, where the gentleman from Texas, speaking about the Washington Post, used the following language:

> Of course, the Post is unreliable and unauthentic. You cannot believe much you see in that paper.

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Ordinarily, that is a fact. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOFFMAN. I wish to assure the gentleman from Texas that had I been aware of what the gentleman was going to read I certainly, out of courtesy, would never have permitted it. [Laughter.]

The gentleman asked us to inquire of the corn farmers in Iowa and, I suppose, the wheat farmers in Kansas and Michigan, as to what they thought of the pay checks they have been receiving. No need to inquire. Quite naturally they are pleased by the receipt of so much money. I think one of the papers quotes it, for the farmers the country over, at over a billion dollars.

We have asked some of the men who have been buying the pork and using the wheat and corn what they thought about the additional cost they had to pay for food when they purchased, and they did not seem too well pleased.

Undoubtedly the gentleman can get the answer on the New Deal as a whole from the Literary Digest poll, if he has it handy. The issue of January 11, 1936, shows that the New Deal received 61.15 percent in the poll of 1934; in the one just completed it received but 38.11 percent; 61.89 percent voted against it. The final result will be announced, as I understand, in November next. [Laughter.]

If the gentleman from Texas really wants to know what the country thought of the A. A. A. prior to the Supreme Court's decision he has but to read the result of the poll on that question published in the Sunday, January 5, issue of the Washington Post, from which he so copiously quoted just a few moments ago. That publication, which he just finished using to demonstrate our return to prosperity, shows that 59 percent of the voters are opposed to the Triple A, while but 41 percent favor it. It is evident that even the agricultural States resent the attempt of the administration to tell them how and when to cultivate, plant, and use their land; that, owning it, paying taxes upon it, they will accept no dictation from Washington.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. After a while, as the gentleman says. [Laughter.]

A monomaniac, you know, is a fellow with one idea; he follows it. A kleptomaniac is a fellow who takes somebody else's property. Now, I will admit that this administration has one ever-present idea—to advance itself in power and to take the taxpayers' money and to give it to someone else to accomplish that purpose. Those benefit checks for the farmer come from the consumers, notwithstanding the fact that your President in substance said in Milwaukee, "Let us not take from Peter to pay Paul." But that is what you have been doing right along. I realize your motives were fine, pure, and grand, and that those little checks, that rain of checks, that gentle rain of checks, were not given out to get votes. Oh, no! It was because you had sympathy and understanding for the downtrodden man.

You collected the pennies of the laboring man, of the housewives who purchased meat, milk, and bread, the necessities of life, to pay a bonus to the agriculturist.

As the Representative from a farming district, as one who owns and operates farms, I should be and I will be the last to condemn legitimate aid for the farmer; but never can I agree to the doctrine of scarcity; that prosperity and plenty will come through failing to till the earth, to produce the things we eat and wear. And how foolish it is to surrender our markets to foreign countries, to pay to limit production, and then expend millions upon millions of dollars to reclaim lands in order that they may be planted to produce greater crops. Let us try at least to be consistent.

The gentleman from Texas referred to the gentleman from New York as a tackle. Does the gentleman know what a tackle is? He is the fellow on the team who breaks through the defensive line, smears the play, and breaks up the offense before it starts. Undoubtedly that is what the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] was doing when he played on the university team. Beyond question that is what he has been doing here in Congress and the country over.

The ineffective tackle on a football team never receives any notice from the opposition. The very fact that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] is the object of a concerted, persistent, and vigorous attack from the whole Democratic organization is proof enough of his ability and effectiveness as an opponent.

Mr. SCHULTE. Notre Dame?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I do not care whether it is Notre Dame or what team it is on. Then the quarterback, you know, calls the signals.' Your quarterback—he so styled himself—has done what? For some months now he has been calling the signals for Tugwell, Wallace, Johnson of pleasant memories, and a host of others who have been withdrawn from the line-up; and the total result, so far as the national debt is concerned, is a loss of something equivalent to 10,000,000,000 yards (dollars) due to his signals.

And your little brainstormers, your little "brain trusters", who were going to remake this fair earth, who were going to lead us into the land of plenty, following his signals, executing his plays, have led us into insecurity, into a maze of unconstitutional laws, and have us out in the end zone with a national deficit the greatest in all peacetime history.

Mr. SCHULTE. That was an inheritance from the Republican Party.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Thank God you had some—what is it?—ancestry; you will never have any posterity. [Laughter.]

I gather that you will admit that the Republican Party has served one useful purpose. Its existence furnishes you with a convenient excuse for your own misdeeds.

Few who have read the President's writings, listened to his radio talks, or heard him deliver his public speeches, including his message to Congress, the last of which was the most dramatic, will doubt his sincerity, his idealism, or his confidence in his own ability to diagnose and cure our social, economic, and political ills. He is a truly great man, if greatness be measured by accomplishments, good or bad.

Like many of those who have marched across the pages of history, his mind entertains no doubt of the righteousness of his own purposes, of the iniquity of those who oppose. He has no doubts of his ability to accomplish his end, of the justice of his method, nor of the incompetency of his opponents and the impropriety of their actions. Having determined to his own satisfaction that he, and he alone, possesses the virtues needed by the times in which he lives, that those who oppose him are actuated only by greed, selfishness, inhumanity, lack of sympathy, and the desire to advance their own interests, he entertains no scruples about brushing them, their suggestions and their criticisms, aside as of no moment.

Not so long ago, in a public speech, he intimated that a new world was created with the death of the Hoover administration and the birth of his own; and so, figuratively at least, he moved the dawn of creation from the time of Adam to the date of his assumption of office, and so attempted to lead us into the delusion, illusion, or hallucination, whichever it may be, that we were again being led through the Garden of Eden by an Eve who offered no temptations.

Ignoring the fact that millions of honest, hard-working, frugal Americans still lived in this country of ours in the year of 1932; that seeds were planted and that crops grew and were harvested; that factories were still in existence and operating; that by far the greater percentage of banks in the country were solvent; that there were hundreds of millions of dollars in the savings of life-insurance companies; and that the depression which existed was due to the speculation of our people and was not the first in the history of our country, with the skill of the true artist, he painted a picture of gloom and distrust that was far darker than that disclosed by the actual conditions.

He charged that business came running to him to be saved, ignoring the fact that his nomination was accomplished on a platform which stated sound, conservative doctrine; that he had made his appeal for election to the discontented and dissatisfied, promising, in effect, that poverty should end and prosperity be universal. With the greatest public debt in the history of our country in peacetime, with a record of extravagance and waste unparalleled by that of any ruler in any country, he the other night told us that we were saved and that business now sought to ignore him.

He forgets that, notwithstanding the expenditure of untold sums, unemployment is still with us in almost as great volume as before, and that the money of the people which he used to prime the pump has but dropped into the depths of the well.

Let me repeat. There is no doubt, in my poor mind, at least, as to his sincerity or the sincerity of some of his followers, if only his speeches, his sayings, and his writings could be accepted at their face value.

Mindful of his intimation in his previous speech that his administration marked the beginning of a new world; that neither life, liberty, nor the pursuit of happiness was secure prior to his inauguration; listening to his impassioned and illogical argument, forgetful of the facts, acknowledging his sincerity, one might have been led to think that he believed he was another Moses, leading his people from a bondage imposed by big business—like Joseph Smith, he was taking them from the land of sin to a more abundant life beyond the reach of legal restrictions.

Not long ago a Townsend writer stated that the doctor's plan was conceived in Heaven, and that, if followed, it would bring happiness and contentment to all. There are those among the admirers of the candidate President who are almost ready to contend that his appearance upon the national horizon was as the prophesied second coming of the Christ, and that his purpose, as indicated by his words, was to cast into outer darkness, as worthy of hell, and hell alone, all those who cannot whole-heartedly applaud his every word and thought.

All he does is right and proper, and all that we on this side suggest is wrong and the work of the devil himself. This is the way you look at it. Surely there must be some place in between where the truth is to be found.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. For a question.

Mr. O'MALLEY. The gentleman said that all that his side suggested was wrong. What has his side suggested?

Mr. HOFFMAN. There you are. That is what the President said the other day. "There are those who, having eyes, see not and, having ears, hear not." Why do you close your eyes and your ears? What have you to suggest? Has the gentleman read what Candidate Knox had to suggest?

Did the gentleman read the farm program suggested by Mr. Knox? What has the gentleman to suggest, when the administration today has yet its first promise to keep?

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, I have read every newspaper printed by Candidate Knox for 20 years and have not seen a suggestion in one of them.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Truly he is a dumb man who can read papers—I do not care what they may be—for that length of time and not get an idea. [Laughter.] I get some from the Townsend Weekly, among them the thought that I cannot come back to Congress unless I surrender my right to represent my district, to form my own judgment, and blindly follow the doctor from California.

Born in a Pennsylvania Dutch home, reared in the Lutheran faith, still believing that somewhere, some place in the universe there must be a guiding, controlling power, nevertheless, I have never been able to bring myself to the full conviction that the multitudes of China, of India, or those who have gone before in this world before the advent of Christianity are doomed to everlasting torture and punishment. My capacity is too limited to acknowledge that kind of a God.

So, while shivering in my seat at the President's denunciation of the wickedness of all business, of all Republicans, of all those who did not accept his leadership, there was some consolation in the thought that those he so bitterly denounced were the very ones who had provided the capital, the factories, the brains, the ability, the energy to carry us through the depression.

It was hardly fair for the gentleman from Texas, when he had the floor, to twit us of collecting campaign funds in chunks. Farley and his cohorts collect not only in chunks, not only by the sale of $50 banquet tickets, but even from the welfare workers.

The gentleman from Texas realizes the situation, I am sure, or, at least, I take it you do, from the complaints which have been made on the floor about the inability to get appointed down there in Texas certain farm examiners to approve farm loans. There was considerable complaint from the gentleman from Texas last session, when he stood on the floor here and stated, in substance, that the administration refused to let him name some of those who were passing upon, or had something to do with, farm loans in his district. Why, you collect even from relief workers, and in my own district Democrats have collected from postmasters.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Not being a prophet, it is not my mission to prophesy.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. If the gentleman will promise to yield to a Republican sometime in the next 3 months, I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. There is not a single Democratic postmaster in the United States who has made a contribution because of having received an appointment. All contributions to the Democratic Party are voluntary. It is a policy of the Democratic administration that they will not permit postmasters to make a single contribution by reason of their appointment.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I am not complaining about the Democratic administration. We realize that no administration would be so corrupt as to publicly, or privately for that matter, sanction such a policy. I am talking about what some of the boys down below did.

Mr. BLANTON. I may say to the gentleman that every Republican postmaster in my State annually and regularly made a contribution to the Republican organization in Texas during his tenure of office.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Prophesying is easy. It is more difficult to point to a record of achievement. So, forsaking the method of the President in prophesying what will happen, let me call your attention to what was accomplished in Kansas, where, without excessive taxation, the State was taken out of the red and put on a sound financial basis.

Or let me get back to Michigan, where, relieved of a Democratic Governor and a Democratic legislature, we have been able to get out of the red.

If the administration desires suggestions, we offer the one that the United States Government follow the same course that was followed in Kansas and Michigan; keep its expenditures within its receipts; do business in a businesslike way. But the change in these two States from threatened bankruptcy to surpluses in the treasuries will, no doubt, be said to be the result of the New Deal.

The N. I. R. A. did not bring prosperity to Michigan. The N. I. R. A. is dead. It was, in fact, dead as General Johnson's dodo bird long before the Supreme Court gave it decent burial. It was not until this month that the President delivered the funeral oration over its demise and, although he frequently said that he was experimenting and that, if his experiments proved unworkable, he would be the first to admit the failure, we have yet to hear anywhere along the official line a single admission that any of the legislation enacted at the "brain trusters'" orders was not perfect.

The N. I. R. A.'s death, by the one faction, is mourned as the end of an organization which was working untold good; heralded by the other as a release from the restrictions which were killing small industry and business.

One thing is beyond argument. In my own self-reliant State of Michigan the automotive industry has gone ahead, brought increased employment, increase in pay rolls, in business, and in prosperity. While some of the companies adopted the N. R. A. code, they were required to make few, if any, changes in their working organization or the conditions prevailing in their factories, and the Ford companies, working independently of the code, have shown perhaps as great an increase in advancement as any.

The President's scolding of businessmen may, as one paper so aptly stated, disclose to Congress the state of his mind, if not the state of the Union. It may have served the purpose of lighting anew in the minds of those without property the flames of class hatred against those who are giving employment. It certainly must have awakened in the mind of every property owner, businessman, manufacturer, farmer, the thought that it is the President's idea to tear down our present institutions and redistribute the wealth, and brought home to the larger corporations the knowledge of a fact, which they have long suspected, that there is a powerful organization in this country prepared to put into operation a great leveling process which will sweep out of existence all large private industries, transferring the management and control to Government officials where it will be used, if not for the accumulation of dividends paid to small stockholders, which seems to be, in the minds of the President and his advisers, a crime, for the creation of a surplus to be used by Government officials, who, by its use, will perpetuate themselves in power.

History demonstrates that the absolute ruler has had less regard for the welfare of the worker than has the modern corporation. In this day and age workers, at least, are not required to make bricks without straw; and however much the critics may rant and rave, however imperfect and oppressive laboring conditions may be, the unalterable fact remains that the workingman of today, on the average, has and enjoys property rights and social privileges far beyond those obtainable by the man of wealth in bygone ages.

While this statement is not intended to mean that ambition should be stifled, or that we should not strive unceasingly to bring about better conditions for all, attention is called to the fact that progress has been made, that progress was made, even before the dawn of the new creation, which some few seem to think began with the inauguration of another President in 1933.

True, the President had asked—and received—from Congress the grant of sums of money greater than ever before placed at the disposal of any one man by a legislative body. He had received a grant of power, from a Congress willing to accept his statements as to his purpose and motives, which made him the most powerful ruler on earth. For many months he has been using that grant of power, the stupendous sums of money, to carry out his purposes, whatever they may have been.

Yet, as he came before us, real employment in useful gainful occupations had been achieved, was being maintained, not by the expenditure of the money granted him under the power authorized, but by those engaged in private industry, whom he so vigorously condemned. Giving all due credit to the relief extended, the work created by the various administration alphabetical organizations, nevertheless, the fact remains that it has been private industry—and private industry alone—which has carried the load.

It is said that business is better; and, quite naturally, the President's followers claim the credit, while those of the opposition point to the greater increase in prosperity in those countries which have not had the so-called benefit of the New Deal theories and practices. But why quarrel as to the causes? Of what moment, except as we learn something of the reasons for the betterment and so reapply the good, if any, and cast aside the inefficient.

The President the other night twitted us for having followed his lead. He said we came to him, when he was nominated, to be saved, and now we were deserting the ship. I recall when he was elected by that overwhelming majority that it was a crime in my State and community to even suggest that anything the President wanted should not be granted to him. They stuck those Blue Eagle cards in the windows of the stores and threatened the housewives with something terrible if they did not purchase from those stores.

What did the Republicans do? When we were charged with lack of patriotism and we were accused of being disloyal if we opposed anything you brought forward, we went along with you. Now what do you say? What was said by the President the other night? After you fellows became rubber stamps, after we joined with you and followed his lead, after we learned by bitter experience that all this New Deal legislation is going by the board and that the President's advisers are incompetent and incapable of handling the matters that come before them, here in this Hall the President the other night accused us of being in the same boat merely because Republicans believed in him. But not again. No more of that.

He fooled Republicans once by his appeal to their patriotism, by begging that they trust him, by asking that they believe in him. They yielded to his smiling countenance, his persuasive words, his declaration of lofty ideals and principles, and gave him their trust and confidence, and now, without one word of apology for the deception practiced upon them, they are ridiculed because of their faith and for accepting blindly the words of a President.

Bitter indeed must be the thought of Republicans, and of Democrats as well, who, against their better judgment, voted for so many of the measures devised by his "brain trusters", some of which have since, by the courts, been held to be unconstitutional because they were unjust, and others of which have, by demonstration, been found to be utterly unsuited for the purpose for which they were devised.

It is humiliation enough to find that one has been foolish, but it is cruel beyond description to be twitted of that fact, after the event, by the one at whose solicitation the foolish act was done.

Oh, I know the answer of the gentleman from Texas and others. This is a great emergency, so they say, but, according to the remarks of the gentleman from Texas this afternoon, we are now on the road to prosperity. The emergency is gone. It has passed away. Then why not reduce Federal expenses?

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes; if the gentleman promises sometime to yield a second time to some Member on this side.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly. It is true that, except as to the extraordinary expenses of relief and public works, every department budget was balanced last year.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The gentleman, I am sure, does not mean that.

Mr. BLANTON. Our Appropriations Committee kept absolutely within the Budget for every department supply bill last year except with reference to relief and public works. We did not exceed Budget estimates.

Mr. HOFFMAN. What about the $4,800,000,000 given the President?

Mr. BLANTON. That was for relief and public works outside of our regular Budget. I happen to be on the Appropriations Committee, and I know that to be a fact.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The President-candidate called our attention the other night to the necessity of the sanctity of agreements among nations. We all approve his statement. Some of us recall his words:

> Remember well that attitude and method—the way we do things, not just the way we say things, is nearly always the measure of our sincerity.

How fine it would have been, could the President have pointed with pride to the fulfillment of the promises contained in the 1932 Democratic platform and his campaign speeches. How hollow his words about the sanctity, the sacredness, of an agreement when those broken promises lie scattered all about him—proof of his insincerity, to his yielding to what he conceived to be either the political expediency of the moment or an actual necessity, if he were to remake our form of government, which he and some of his official family have been seeking to do by arraying class against class until today there is in this country more class consciousness and bitterness between classes than ever before.

We were told that there is neither war, nor rumor of war, nor desire for war, in this country. How long has it been since we were told that unless the President was elected to office, that unless his policies, after he was elected, were adopted by the Congress, that unless he had his way with his New Deal legislation and Congress became a rubber stamp, we should have a revolution?

Revolution! Revolution! That word he and his supporters have repeated almost incessantly, until some actually came to believe that submission to his desire was our only salvation.

War, rumor of war, in the United States! Do we not hear, day after day, the threat, under the cloak of charity, the mantle of sympathy, to give to those who have not by taking away from those who have? Does not the Government already take from every citizen 25 cents of every dollar by way of taxation? Has not this administration continually sought to purchase the vote of one class of people at the expense of another? Has not the administration, day in and day out, been engaged in levying, or the attempt to levy, taxes upon one group, as an example, the consumer, for the benefit of the producer? How long has it been since, at the President's request, a law was enacted authorizing the Government to pay as high as $1.29 for an ounce of silver worth but 55 cents?

Some of these efforts, halted by the Supreme Court because they were unjust as well as unconstitutional, it is said in high authorities, will be renewed in a different form, in a different manner, and, if necessary, the Constitution will be amended or the Supreme Court abolished or its membership increased.

In other countries, in other times, the unjust effort to take the property of one class and to give it to another has been met by open warfare. If this leveling process continues, will there not come a time, as it came in Old World countries, when those having property will be compelled to resort to force to retain that which they, without injustice, painstakingly acquired?

Not so long ago the man who openly stated that the world owed him a living, who refused to work, was regarded as a social outcast. Today there is throughout our country a large group of those who believe in that theory, and who act upon their belief, and who are being supported by the industrious and the frugal.

That this class has so rapidly increased, that it is so great today, is due in large part to the doctrines taught by the present administrative officials. They have spread the idea that from all who have worked and saved should be taken a portion of their earnings and their savings, to be redistributed by Government officials, not only among the needy, the deserving, but to those who appear to be such.

It is but a short step from this idea of the Federal Government collecting and dispensing the money of its taxpayers—not by law enacted by Congress but by rule and regulation promulgated by administrative officers—to an absolute dictatorship.

The President told us correctly that autocracy in world affairs endangers peace. And he might have said, as well, that autocracy in this Government breeds discontent, and that his ever-increasing bureaus, with their multitude of rules and regulations, are bearing so heavily upon the people that the New Deal, which was so overwhelmingly popular in 1932, has by the recent Literary Digest poll been demonstrated to be destined for the garbage can.

The share-the-wealth movement, the Townsend plan, which the Democratic candidate for the Presidency and the Democratic majority in this House will bitterly oppose, are but the fruits of the seed sown so lavishly and so widely by the exponents of the New Deal. The advocate of the $200-a-month pension is evidently a graduate of the President's college, who has received his diploma and is giving the administration a practical demonstration of the things he there learned.

There are those among us who still believe that the States are fully competent to care for their aged, their infirm, their needy. There are States like Michigan, which have long had upon their books laws prohibiting child labor, insuring good working conditions, protection for widows, for orphans, pensions for the aged, workmen's compensation laws, and under those laws, so far as the record discloses, no man, woman, or child in Michigan has ever died of starvation or of want; and while beyond question there is suffering and the laws must be liberalized and their scope extended, we believe that the duty is the duty of the State, one reason being that the conditions surrounding these people are the conditions permitted by the State, and the State should rightfully pay for the misery, want, or suffering which it causes or permits.

There are few among us who do not know of the waste, the extravagance, and the dishonesty, some necessarily present, in the operations of the Government, in its expenditures of the sums so recently granted the President. Yet even though we honestly disagree as to the method, and do not concede that all power should be centered in Washington and its politicians, we are accused of a lack of compassion, of sympathy, of being heartless, inhuman, unmindful of our duty.

We remember, however, that charity begins at home, and we know full well that the local communities in the various States, and the State itself spending its own money, can correct these conditions where they exist far more efficiently than can some political administrator or case worker from abroad, for by local authorities most accurately can the deserving be distinguished from the undeserving and the measure of the need be determined.

The President-candidate said we were dominated by big business prior to his coming into office and prior to the creation of this new Eden. Would you rather be dominated by big business or Wallace, Tugwell, or some "brain stormer"? At least big business has sense enough to conserve its resources so that it has the ability to carry on in time of adversity. I may say that the automobile industry in Michigan has given employment to more men and has paid out more dollars for honest labor than any of your Tugwells or Wallaces.

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the gentleman yield for information?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I could not give the gentleman any information.

Mr. COCHRAN. I will give the gentleman information.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Nobody on this side is capable of giving any information, and you would not listen to it anyway.

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the gentleman yield for some real information in regard to the birth of N. I. R. A.?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN. I want to tell the gentleman that the former president of the Manufacturers Association of the United States, who came from my city, St. Louis, came to my office and pleaded with me to vote for the national-recovery bill. If big business did not have anything to do with the national-recovery bill, why did the Manufacturers Association president ask me to vote for it?

Mr. HOFFMAN. What business was he in?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Michigan 5 additional minutes.

Mr. COCHRAN. He was president of the Lambert Pharmaceutical Co., of St. Louis, and also at that time was president of the National Manufacturers Association, that is now assailing the President. His name is Robert Lund, and, as I say, he was then president of the Manufacturers Association. They wanted to beat the 30-hour bill. They brought in the national-recovery bill to beat it, and, I repeat, he came to me and pleaded with me to vote for the national-recovery bill, and I told him I would vote for it if the President wanted it. I supported the President then, and I am supporting him now.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I can see why the leader of a big business concern or a large corporation that has a monopoly would go to a man on this side and plead with him, because it is a universally known fact that all of your legislation in the end has resulted in benefit to big business, which it claims to be after. What about your little battery shop in Pennsylvania, whose owner, Perkins, you sent to jail under an unconstitutional law because he wanted to operate his own business in an honest way and give employment to his neighbors? What about the woman in New York whom you would not let make flowers in her own home in order that she might earn money sufficient to keep her children with her?

Mr. COCHRAN. Ask me about St. Louis, and I will answer.

Mr. HOFFMAN. What about the bakers that you sent to jail because they sold bread cheaper than the price fixed by the N. R. A. code; and what about the little tailor who pressed clothes too cheaply?

Mr. COCHRAN. Not in St. Louis.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Sure, when putting out political ballyhoo, you are after big business; but you brought down here the biggest political businessman of all, Jim Farley, the boy who lets nobody escape, who starts in with a $50 banquet ticket and goes straight down the line without missing anybody until he comes to the boy working on W. P. A. projects, and takes it out of the pay checks in our own county. [Applause.]

This administration against big business? Hardly. How absurd! Note these statements from an editorial in the Chicago Tribune of January 6. I quote:

> Mr. Roosevelt's stump speech to the radio audience was another of his calculated attempts to inflame class hatred. The opposition to him and his administration, he said, consisted of nothing more than a handful of bloated plutocrats. To be sure, he admitted, they have their millions of followers, but this following is made up of stooges and dupes.
>
> This is his answer to the indication of the Literary Digest poll that two-thirds of the voters in the United States are eager for the opportunity to vote him and his addle-brained administration out of office. The millions who have come to distrust and fear him, so he says, don't know what it is all about. Mr. Roosevelt pretends that taxpayers don't know what he is costing them; that housewives don't know that the cost of living has gone up and up; that stockholders who have organized for self-protection by the hundreds of thousands have no reason to fear his program of spoliation; that owners of insurance policies and savings accounts feel under obligations to him for jeopardizing the security they had bought and paid for.
>
> If Mr. Roosevelt thinks he can get away with that, his conceit matches his hypocrisy.
>
> He talks of bloated plutocrats, he who was born to great wealth and never had to earn his living! Mr. Roosevelt is a far richer man, and his wife is a far richer woman, than all but a few of his opponents. His intimates, like Vincent Astor, are all rich men.
>
> He talks about "unscrupulous money changers" and conveniently forgets that he ran a neat little pool in German marks when the exchange rates were running wild.
>
> He speaks with justified contempt of "the manipulations of dishonest speculators", conveniently forgetting those stock-peddling circulars of only a few years ago which bore his name. Mr. Roosevelt, who lent his name and his reputation to the flotation of Camco, one of the wildest of the boom-time promotions, now dares to denounce stock jobbery. The suckers who placed faith in the business competence and integrity of Franklin D. Roosevelt, director of the Consolidated Automatic Vending Machine Co., do not speak over Nation-wide hook-ups, but they have not forgotten.
>
> The same Roosevelt who now denounces the "rulers of the exchanges of mankind's goods" is the same Roosevelt who, as Governor of New York, took no step to regulate the greatest of all the exchanges. The New York Stock Exchange and the New York Curb Exchange, around which clustered most of the financial abuses of the boom era, were under the Roosevelt thumb during the boom era. The speculator in German marks and the director of Camco did nothing to protect the innocent investor when he most needed protection. It is curious that Mr. Roosevelt overlooked that fact the other night when he was shouting that he, and he alone, had the will and the competence to protect the little fellow from the plutocrats who "rule the exchanges."
> This is the Roosevelt who now says that those who oppose him are plutocrats and the dupes and stooges of plutocrats. No wonder Mr. Farley has felt impelled to try to explain what his chief meant the other night and has made a poor job of the explanation. No wonder the editorial supporters of the administration have been hard put to it to justify the speech and have fallen back on the labored and the obvious.
> Mr. Roosevelt's hypocrisy was too evident. No competent defense was made of that speech because no competent defense could be made of it or the man who delivered it.

We were told the other evening by the Presidential candidate that in the Old World countries people were blindly following their leaders, and the danger of such action was plainly brought home to us. Like those of other countries criticized by the President, this Congress has followed blindly and fervently the lead of those who seek autocratic power.

True, indeed, were the words which called this condition to our minds, and how recently, how strikingly, and disastrously has the truth of this statement been demonstrated and the folly of the Congress in blindly following the lead of, and adopting the concoctions of Corcoran, Cohen, and their associates been demonstrated.

The embryos which came as the result of the brainstorms of these gentlemen, instead of blossoming forth in all their glory and leading us into the brightness of a new day have, in the end, been shown by practice and Court decisions to be only abortions and miscarriages.

The President told us that we have recently witnessed the domination of Government by dominant financial groups. Still more recently he might, with equal truth, have said that we have been living under a government of bureaucrats and politicians, the crown prince of which is the politically efficient Postmaster General and Democratic National Committeeman, who advises the Republicans to shake dice to determine their Presidential nominee. Doubtless, he is familiar with that method and, whoever might be the choice, if so selected, it is certain that the nominee when elected could bring no greater harm to our people and our country than the nominee picked by him.

If the peace of our country is, as we are told, threatened by those who seek selfish power we need travel no farther than the city of Washington to put our hands upon the ambitious gentleman. When in any democratic form of government has like power been granted to any man or group of men? With the President's cry to restore power to those to whom it rightfully belongs we heartily agree. The Supreme Court is doing what it can to further that end. We have faith that in November of 1936 the job will be finished, that power will be so restored.

No statement was ever truer than that of the President when he said:

> We have returned the control of the Federal Government to the city of Washington. To be sure, in so doing, we have invited battle; we have earned the hate of entrenched greed.

Yes; you have returned the control of the Federal Government to the city of Washington. Your campaign orators have damned Wall Street, the international bankers; they deserved it at times, but those gentlemen, if guilty of all you charged, at least had the decency to attempt to conceal their efforts within the confines of Wall Street.

You returned the control of the Federal Government, not to the Congress elected from the various States, but to a Johnson, now a pleasant memory; to his playmate, Tugwell, whom Johnson so recently is reported to have described as a "marcelled ass"; to a Wallace, a breeder of high-bred corn, guaranteed to grow two ears where but one grew before, and who has been administering the policy of paying a bounty for not growing corn; to others who have, by you, been placed in authority, who have usurped the lawmaking prerogatives of Congress and who have gathered about them employees in such vast numbers that Wallace's force alone is stated in current newspapers to be equal to that of the standing Army, until the city of Washington is packed with humanity as sardines are put into a can, until official Washington has actually come to believe that the rest of the country exists only for the purpose of furnishing revenue, through taxation, to be here used and spent, disbursed so as to perpetuate in power this government at Washington.

Yes; we agree. "By their fruits ye shall know them." And what are the fruits? Waste, extravagance, discontent, class hatred, the creation of a horde of political officeholders, an increase in the public debt, in taxation, so great that the people are coming to realize that national bankruptcy will be the inevitable result of a continuation of the policy.

We have been challenged to repeal the laws enacted in furtherance of this so-called New Deal. The unworkability of some, as stated, has been demonstrated. Others have been wiped out by the Supreme Court.

You ask for a program, for constructive suggestions. If instead of devising new ways to impose burdens upon the people, to create new sources of revenue, to purchase by means of bounty or of benefit another group of voters, someone connected with the administration would cease admiring the work so far accomplished by it and listen to some of the things which have been said, read some of the suggestions which have been offered, both by businessmen and by legislators of experience, it would be discovered that many such suggestions have been made. It might even be learned that Colonel Knox and others have offered farm programs which are sound and workable.

But, as in the days of old, having ears, they hear not; having eyes, they see not.

In the early days of this administration the President chose to regard himself as the quarterback of a football eleven, guiding its destinies, asking cooperation from all. He received that cooperation. He played both ends against the middle, and he crowned his achievement, demonstrated his supremacy, when, at his signal the other night, members of his illustrious Cabinet, gray, reserved, and dignified Senators and Members of Congress, were called together to assist in witnessing one of his last great plays, an appeal to the grandstand.

Cabinet members, Senators, and Congressmen faithfully and loyally, at his glance and his smile, cheered when he paused, laughed when he smiled, yelled when he nodded. You could almost hear him say, "Here is the little girl, the New Deal; come on, friends, give her a big hand." They made of themselves the musical instrument upon which he played his tune for the benefit of his radio audience. Proud, indeed, must be the Cabinet members, Senators, and Representatives of the use to which they were put.

Through two sessions of Congress the President has used them as errand boys, "yes" men, and rubber stamps; at last he calls them in on the side lines and lets them cheer his show.

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE].

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Chairman, since March 4, 1933, I have sat here almost each day that the House has been in session, and for the first 3 or 4 months after March 4, 1933, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], of the gentle manners, of the modest demeanor, of the mellifluous voice, and of the wise brain, kept perfectly silent; but no sooner had the wisdom and the patriotism of the New Deal again made the country safe from revolution than each year since, each month since, each week since, each day since, and practically each hour since, he has regaled us with petty criticisms of that which we have done to set the house of the American people in order again.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EAGLE. I ask all my friends or any adversary, please, during these few minutes I have not to interrupt me, because I have a thing or two I wish to say undiverted.

I can well understand how that gentleman [Mr. FISH], and others similarly feeling and situated, would have remained silent in March and April of 1933. They had sat still in this Chamber as Members for more than 3 years since the crash in 1929, without the wisdom to utter a constructive thought, utterly crushed by the crash of the country which their administration's lack of wisdom in legislation and in administration had wrought, until the tragedy of all America was upon the country.

Prior to March 4, 1933, banking had broken down so completely that 10,335 banks had closed their doors in 3 years' time. One-half million employees had been let out of the railroads. Credit had broken down. Wall Street and big business, which are his political gods, had ceased to have an idea, less still a statesman, and Republican President Hoover sat expecting prosperity to return as a miracle around the corner. Sixteen million workers were out of work, and they, with their wives and children and dependents, made 50,000,000 persons who were hungry. Whatever thought, therefore, President Roosevelt could recommend, and we upon the Democratic side could put into execution, was preferable to a bloody revolution that would have ensued within 60 days if the Republican President had continued to sit in the White House and such paucity of ideas had continued to actuate the Republican Congress. But no sooner had the New Deal of Roosevelt given confidence and hope again to the country, no sooner had we rejuvenated banking and industry, no sooner had we fed the poor and put hope into human hearts than the same reactionary forces that had pillaged and plundered and robbed and wrecked and ruined the American people for 12 long years, from 1921 to 1933, made up their minds that they would again, by misrepresenting issues to the American people, lead them back into a Republican administration which would again pillage and wreck and plunder and rob and despoil and ruin the American people.

While we on the Democratic side have had no time or opportunity to respond to these attacks, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] has sought constantly to interrupt the harmony of these proceedings by captious, partisan, carping criticism.

Very well, gentlemen, our structure of the New Deal is almost complete. We are proud of this noble work and want to go to the country with the explanation that it is complete from the mudsills to the roof. We welcome these attacks and say with Shakespeare:

> Lay on, Macduff;
> And damn'd be him that first cries, "Hold, enough!"

We will meet you at Philippi, and we welcome the attacks of all parties and scoffers. This New Deal by the Democratic administration and the Congress has been the best friend that business in this Nation ever had. Almost the first thing the Democratic Congress did on the 9th of March 1933, as I recall it, was to make eligible for rediscount practically every piece of paper to the extent of $2,000,000,000 in every one of the remaining open banks in the land. We lent the banks

$1,843,000,000 so they could keep their doors open. We bought $329,000,000 of their long-term notes. We bought $637,000,000 of their preferred shares; and then to give confidence to the country in the banking fabric we guaranteed deposits first for $2,500 and then for $5,000, so that we made all the banks that were then open liquid, able to stand up against every wind that blows.

We lent the railroads $451,000,000 in the year 1933. We lent the mortgage-loan companies $297,000,000 so they could live. We lent the building and loan associations $115,000,000 to prevent their collapse, and the insurance companies more than $100,000,000. We first made sound the business fabric of the Nation at the ultimate risk or expense of producer and laborer and masses of the people whose toil pays the interest and ultimately redeems the bonds to do that. We fed those 50,000,000 of hungry people until hope could again come and industry start up—holding up the financial and business structure meanwhile. Was there any objection from the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] to the doing of those things? No; and why? Because that was good business; that was not socialistic or communistic at all. The corporations were getting it, big business was getting it, when this Government owed no obligation, financially or morally, to them. But no sooner do we think in terms of the welfare of him and his family who toil in the fields to make the wheat and the cotton and the corn and all other raw materials, no sooner do we think in terms of the welfare of the laborer in the towns and villages and cities who processes that raw material, and the welfare of the humble and the poor, the scattered, disorganized masses, than the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] and his Republican cohorts, aided and abetted by corporation-owned Wall Street, aided and abetted by the Wall Street controlled portion of the daily press of the Nation, aided and abetted by paid writers and kept magazines, feeling now safe from revolution, try constantly to poison the people against understanding of this noble and spiritual and sound and wise point of view that has actuated recommendation and enactment of the New Deal. No sooner do we do this than the gentleman from New York and his cohorts would lead the people away from those who have saved them from rack and ruin and revolution and would again turn the people of this Nation over to the special interests, again to be pillaged as they were for 12 years while Wall Street robbed—first, under Harding; second, under Coolidge; and, third, under Hoover. These Republican gentlemen brand as socialistic and communistic all these noble enactments that have blessed the poor.

Now they want to turn this Nation back to the grand old Republican Party—the grand old Republican Party, whose President appointed Republican Senator Fall to be Secretary of the Treasury——

A MEMBER. The Interior.

Mr. EAGLE. Thank you. I see that our Republican friends have not forgotten what office it was that their Republican brother Fall disgraced—Secretary of the Interior, who sold the Navy's oil reserves to his co-conspirators for cash money and bonds for his own pocket, to the eternal disgrace of the Republican administration and the shame of the American people. Back to the good old Republican Party, whose Republican President picked Republican Daugherty as Republican Attorney General, who made out of the law-enforcement agency of the United States a private prohibition racketeering, crime-racketeering organization for his own purse.

Back to the good old Republican Party, whose Republican President appointed the Republican Forbes as Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, who sold the veterans' supplies for cash and stole the money. Back to the good old Republican Party whose Secretary of the Treasury put his arm up to the shoulder into the people's Treasury and took out several billion dollars of alleged excess income-tax payment and gave them to the big corporations, his own included. Back to the good old Republican Party, they would have this country turned—the party that turned over all processes of legislation and of administration for 12 long years to Wall Street that it might exploit this helpless and disorganized mass of American people. Back to the good old Republican Party, whose President, when thousands of war veterans came to the Capital to petition for a redress of their grievances, banished them from this Capital as if they were alien enemies.

Their crime was that after the war was over they came humbly petitioning for redress of their grievances, and were driven by the Republican President out of the Capital with gas and soldiers and other forms of warfare.

In conclusion, if the American people do permit such deception to mislead them so that they again banish their friends and elect their common enemies and exploiters, the Republicans, they will be again enslaved as peons—which God forbid!

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I was very much interested in listening to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE]. I was so interested that I sent for the directory to find out what it contained. It reads in part as follows:

> Born at Tompkinsville, Ky., January 23, 1870; at 14 years of age received first-grade county teacher's certificate; taught writing in schools each winter to earn money with which to go through college, graduating at 17 years of age at Burritt College, Spencer, Tenn.; moved to Texas in 1887 and taught school 6 years, becoming superintendent of city schools—

And it goes on to say so much about education that I was just wondering whether it was one of those professors we have been talking about so much since we have been in this last session of Congress. I hope that in the future discussions on the floor any individual may be able to find something from those political discussions that will benefit both sides of the House. A house built on sand will fall. Watch this administration crumble under the unconstitutional legislation it has enacted into law.

I am interested today in answering the question I asked of the majority leader on Friday last, whether the speech that was to be delivered that evening by the President of the United States was to be political. The majority leader [Mr. BANKHEAD] did not give me the answer, and I do not know whether it was because he did not wish to convey that information or whether he did not know. It seems to me the majority leader of the House of Representatives should know and have good reason why things should happen in the House, and that he should be interested in seeing that only those things should transpire that are for the best interests of the American people.

The House of Representatives and the Senate were requested by the President of the United States to put off the address on the state of the Union, which is required by the Constitution at the opening of the session of Congress. Yet we waited from 2 o'clock in the afternoon until 9 o'clock at night. The fact that 435 Congressmen and 96 Senators and many other Government officials should be requested to sit idly by for that length of time in order to hear an address supposedly on the state of the Union, when the President of the United States has known for more than a year that Congress convened at 12 o'clock on January 3, is perhaps immaterial.

I was tempted, when it was told me that we were going to have a political speech, to object. Then I thought it was the duty of the President of the United States to make an address, if he chose to do so, and cause the Members of Congress to wait until he was desirous of speaking to them. For that reason alone I felt it my duty, after persuasion of the leaders on the Republican side, not to object to his delivering this speech on the state of the Union. To my utter amazement, when I was looking forward to hearing a good, sound, sensible address by the President of the United States advising Congress of the importance of certain things that should be put into law and of the things that had transpired during the past year, we were confronted with a purely cheap political address. In the first part of his address he spoke about peace. I do not believe there is a man in America today who is not interested in peace—not only the peace of America but the peace of the whole world. We are with him 100 percent in that. I think the membership of the House of Representatives—and I hope the people of this Nation—are all sympathetic with that idea. But when I heard his speech delivered to Congress on peace of the world I could not reconcile it with his Budget estimate on Monday. The President proposed to raise a billion dollars for an increase of the Army, the Navy, and the Air Corps for purposes of war after recommending to the American people and to the world that we be sympathetic for peace. It does not seem like a wise and sensible thing for a man in the Presidential chair to do. It is only waving the red flag in front of the bull, as it were, causing people all over the world to think that we are now going to try to outdo them in the construction of things that are for war. I was very much surprised at that; he talks peace but is preparing for war.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I prefer not to yield at this time.

Mr. McCORMACK. Very well. I respect the gentleman's views.

Mr. RICH. Each and every Member of Congress has taken an oath and obligation to support the Constitution of the United States. A violation of our oath and obligation is a violation of the Constitution. I cannot help but think of March 4, 1933, when these words ring in my ears:

> I, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, do solemnly swear that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States and will, to the best of my ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States, so help me God.

When the President concluded his address that day I thought to myself it was one of the finest addresses I had ever heard, in generalities, for the things he was going to do for the American people. I said to myself, "I am going to support him through thick and thin, regardless of politics, because I believe he is going to carry out the promises he has made." I voted for the Economy Act to try to get him on the right start immediately; but it was not 3 months until my faith was so shaken that I came to the conclusion he was not going to do the things he had promised the American people he would do. I am going to quote his own words and try to show you from the things he has said and done that he is not a man to be trusted. He is not a man of his word. I do not have the least thing against the President of the United States personally, nor any other public official, nor any Member of Congress. This I want understood, but I am against many things that they do.

There is an old saying, "You can catch a thief, but you cannot believe a man who prevaricates." The time the President of the United States repudiated the oath and obligation he took when he was sworn in was on July 6, 1935, when he wrote to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HILL], chairman of a subcommittee of the Committee on Ways and Means, urging the passage of the Guffey-Snyder coal bill:

> I hope your committee will not permit doubt as to the constitutionality, however reasonable, to block the suggested legislation.

Writing this after he took the oath and obligation to support the Constitution is a deliberate falsehood, a broken promise.

Throughout the past 2 or 3 years in the consideration of legislation, regarding which there was in the minds of the President or the Members of Congress a doubt as to its constitutionality, we had the privilege and the power of securing the best legal talent in the United States to determine whether it was bordering the line of unconstitutionality. This being so, we should not pass legislation that would in any way conflict with the Constitution. If we do not like the Constitution, we should change it in a constitutional way. Members of Congress have followed the President of the United States; Members who were elected to office and who rode into Congress on his coattails, because of his popularity, followed him because they thought he was going to be a man who would tell the American people the truth, a man who would stand upright as all good men should and try to lead the American people to a better day and give them that liberty, that freedom of action, which should be given to all American citizens that they might have the more abundant life. This is a quality we should think of in the President of the United States as the leader; and he should, above all things, be honest, be a man of his word.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. RICH. I cannot yield now. There is nobody to whom I would rather yield than the gentleman from Texas, but I cannot yield now. I am sorry.

When I think of those promises he has made to the American people, when I think that when he flew from New York to Chicago after the Democratic platform had been adopted and he said to the delegation in Chicago and to the people at large, "I am for this platform 100 percent", I cannot help but think also of how it has not been carried out. Let us see what that platform promised to the American people, and then I want to show you, if it is at all possible, how far he has gone afield from those promises and that his word is not to be believed. I am so sorry for that because I would like to have followed him or anybody else who was trying to do the thing that was for the best interests of the American people; but when a man tells me he is going to do one thing and then does something else I leave him. You should do the same; he is a dangerous man.

The point I want to make here with the Members of this House is: For God's sake, men, think for yourselves from now on; do not be rubber stamps; do not do what that man tells you to do or the most sorrowful day America has ever faced is in the future and not so very distant.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 additional minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. Let us see what the Democratic platform said:

> To accomplish these purposes and to recover economic liberty, we pledge the nominees of this convention the best efforts of a great party whose founder announced the doctrine which guides us now in the hour of our country's needs: Equal rights to all; special privileges to none.

That Democratic convention nominated Franklin D. Roosevelt, of New York, for President, and John N. Garner, of Texas, for Vice President. The preamble of that platform contains the following statement:

> We believe that a party platform is a covenant with the people to be faithfully kept by the party when entrusted with power, and that the people are entitled to know in plain words the terms of the contract to which they are asked to subscribe. We hereby declare this to be the platform of the Democratic Party:
> The Democratic Party solemnly promises by appropriate action to put into effect the principles, policies, and reforms herein advocated and to eradicate the policies, methods, and practices herein condemned. We advocate an immediate and drastic reduction of governmental expenditures by abolishing useless commissions and offices, consolidating departments and bureaus, and eliminating extravagance, to accomplish a saving of not less than 25 percent in the cost of Federal Government, and we call upon the Democratic Party in the States to make a zealous effort to achieve a proportionate result.

The President was sworn to uphold this platform, yet never in the history of this Nation have we had such extravagance. Never in the history of this Nation have we set up so many bureaus. In his great political speech on January 3, wherein he mentions himself so often, he uses the big personal pronoun "I" 36 times, as if he were the writer of all the laws that were put into effect last year and not the Members of Congress.

Speaking of the reduction of expenditures by the Federal Government, on January 3 of this year, according to the statement of Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau, we were in debt $30,559,804,117.44.

And do not forget, my dear friends, that he devalued gold—another broken promise of the President of the United States. He charged off $2,000,000,000, and that is not included in that statement. Instead of his trying to balance the Budget as he promised in the platform, he has been the most extravagant Executive who has ever been in public office. When the President of the United States tells you that he is going to do those things and then turns right around and does the very opposite, who in the world can believe him?

The President made the statement that he was going to enforce the antitrust laws. There was put into effect at his recommendation the unconstitutional N. I. R. A. When that was done there were laid aside all antitrust laws. I say to the Members of Congress that we ought to enforce the antitrust laws and stop big business from throttling the little businessman. There is no way under the sun to do that until we, as Members of Congress, take an affirmative stand with reference to throttling big business and prohibiting these consolidations.

There was promised by the Democratic Party in another plank the removal of Government from business. My good friend the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHANNON], when he came to the House of Representatives, was the originator of an effort to stop the Government from going into business. He offered a bill last year providing for an accounting system of everything in all Government departments. If that bill were passed it would put the Government out of private business, because we would be able to tell what these various business enterprises were costing the taxpayers of the country. We would kick out of politics many of these new organizations which this administration has put into effect.

The President asked the other night what administration laws we would kick out? I will tell you the first thing I would do. I would take away all the power from the President of the United States that the Congress has given to him the past 2 years, retaining this power within our own body and the Senate, where it belongs. Then I would kick out a great many of these alphabetical organizations. The Supreme Court kicked out the A. A. A. the other day. Then there is the C. A. B., the C. C. C., the C. F. B., C. W. A., D. L. B., E. C., E. H. C., E. H. F. A., F. A. C. A., F. C. A., F. C. T., F. D. I. C., E. E. R. A., F. E. S. B., F. H. L. B., H. O. L. C., I. A. B., J. E. B., L. A. B., N. C. B., N. E. C., N. L. B., N. R. A., P. A. B., P. I. A., P. S. A. C., P. W. A., S. A. B., T. V. A., U. S. E. S., and so forth, and so on.

And do not worry about the G. O. P. Just read this magazine, the Literary Digest poll, and see what the American people are now thinking about it. [Applause.]

I am not trying to be funny. I want you as Members of Congress to realize your responsibility as such. It is high time that men who occupy responsible positions assume this responsibility. I hope there is not a Member of Congress elected in 1936 who will not assume his full responsibility, and this applies to me as well as to everyone else. I tell you that it is high time to do away with a one-man administration. We should not let one individual, regardless of who he is, usurp the powers that the Constitution of the United States has given to Members of Congress.

I want to quote from an Englishman, William E. Gladstone, at the time he interpreted the Constitution of the United States. I want to give you the words of that great lawyer.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is about to read something that is not in his own speech.

Mr. RICH. I do not wish to misinterpret anything, and these words are a lot better than anything I could write, and I question whether any Member of this Congress is able to frame it in better language.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist on his point of order?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Gladstone made this statement:

> The American Constitution is, so far as I can see, the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man.

Then there was Thomas Jefferson, that great author, whom you claim as a former member of the Democratic Party. He was a great man. Let it be known also that he was a Democrat. If you please, if he was as great as you claim, and if men not only in this country but in foreign countries lauded his work, let us as Members of Congress stand up and try to carry out those fundamental principles upon which America was founded. If you continue to follow the man who is now President of the United States, a man you cannot believe, and you attempt to carry out his principles and teachings, socialistic and communistic, America is in the greatest danger that it has ever been in its history. We are piling up on the young people of today such an enormous debt that they will never be able to get out from under. It is our responsibility, and ours alone, to handle the situation which we find ourselves in at this time and not endeavor to pass it on to future generations to wreck them and the country. The boys and girls who are now in high schools will never be able to stand the great amount of indebtedness which we are piling onto them. The responsibility will be too great. It is your responsibility and my responsibility, and we ought to face it. If we continue with a ruthless expenditure of funds, where are we going to get the money? You must do one of two things. You must either stop spending or increase your rate of taxation. This is inevitable if you do not want America to lose its freedom and if you do not want our Government to take some other form, such as exists in Russia, perhaps, or in some other foreign country, which would not be acceptable or satisfactory to the free, liberty-loving American people.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHANNON].

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Chairman, this is Jackson Day, and it has occurred to me that I might contribute a few remarks to the many that will be uttered today throughout the land in memory of that great American soldier, statesman, and jurist.

I have observed that too frequently memorial day orators do not discuss Old Hickory at all in their speeches, or at least give him scant recognition. I remember attending a Jackson Day meeting at Springfield, Mo., some years ago. There were two great speakers at the meeting and they delivered quite eloquent orations upon the fitness of certain candidates for public office, but when they got through they had forgotten to say a word about Andrew Jackson or even to mention his great victory in the Battle of New Orleans whose anniversary established this memorial day.

Sitting by my side on that occasion was a former Member of this House, Mr. Perl Decker, who has since passed away. Let me invoke a blessing on his memory, in passing. He stood upon the floor of this House and made a gallant fight against our participation in a war concerning which many of us even to this day are ignorant of the causes which led us into it or of what it was all about after we got into it. Decker was the son of a Union soldier, born in the State of Kansas. Being an intelligent and a patriotic man, when he came over to Missouri he became a Democrat and was elected to this House. He was one of the small minority who voted "no" on the question of this country's entrance into the World War—a world war which was not of our world nor within the genius of our time-honored ideals or national policies.

If the same question should come up today, in the light of all the revelations that have come to us since, I feel sure that a great majority of this House would vote, as Perl Decker did, against sending American boys to warring European countries, with their traditional principles of power and aggression—countries that their ancestors abandoned because they wanted to get away from the turmoil and strife and bloodshed which had existed there for centuries, and to seek a haven in a new land founded at least upon faith in liberty, fraternity, equality, and peace.

In this connection I recall something that I heard from the lips of John Sharp Williams upon one occasion in the Senate at a time when this country was on the edge of a bitter controversy with Mexico that had arisen from the protests of certain naval officers because their ship had not been properly saluted by the Mexican officials. Senator Williams said:

> These naval officers want us to go to war with Mexico for the reason that a naval commander who went to Tampico was not properly saluted; the flag was not dipped as it should have been.

Now, mark you, Mexico is a country we do not now recognize as a nation. I am here to say that all the naval punctilio this side of hell is not worth the sacrifice of one American boy's life.

And I am glad that I feel myself able to say on behalf of this House today, without regard to political affiliations, that every Member of it would join me in saying that we do not want any more lives sacrificed because of foreign battles or foreign diplomatic entanglements that we have no concern in and know nothing about. [Applause.]

But to come back to that Jackson Day meeting at Springfield, I recall today that my friend Decker, toward the end of the meeting, was deeply chagrined and aggrieved because he said he had attended the meeting to hear about Andrew Jackson and the Battle of New Orleans of which he was the great hero, and he had not heard a word in praise of either the man or the famous event.

He turned to me and said, "SHANNON, I am going to move that you make an Andrew Jackson speech." I said, "I am not prepared to do that; I cannot undertake to do that now." He said, "Yes; you can. I have heard you talk about Jefferson and Jackson, and we will just reorganize this meeting and have a Jackson Day speech with Jackson in it." So we did take charge of the meeting, and we both contributed some Andrew Jackson comments and some memories of New Orleans and that fateful day of January 8, and we left the meeting in better spirits. So I trust that in the many meetings that are being held today and tonight throughout the country, in forums and banquet halls, neither Andrew Jackson nor the cause of the day we celebrate—the anniversary of the battle in which a handful of American soldiers, with Jackson in the lead, conquered twice their number of the seasoned veterans of Wellington's wars—will be overlooked or forgotten.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHANNON. I have only 10 minutes.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I simply want to make the statement that if we study at the same time Andrew Jackson's attitude toward the debts that Europe owes us and the manner in which he collected the debt from France when he was President, we will make some headway on the debts the Allies owe us today, because he solved the problem and collected the debts, and never a shot was fired.

Mr. SHANNON. Perhaps the gentleman is right.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHANNON. I yield.

Mr. EATON. Does not the gentleman think that the tuition fee of $50 per for this Jackson education tonight is pretty high?

Mr. SHANNON. I have not paid mine yet, but I may do so before night.

THE ORIGINAL PARTY OF LIBERTY AND PROGRESS

But let us return to Jackson; it is so easy for a Republican in these days to switch a fellow onto a sidetrack. Andrew Jackson's influence upon the great Democratic Party that held this country in safe control during its most critical periods of progress was different in many ways from that of Thomas Jefferson. I know that many of our patriots like to forget—or let the people forget—that it was under Jeffersonian leadership that the principles embodied in the Bill of Rights were added to the Constitution, that the Nation's boundaries were extended to the western ocean, and the wilderness West carved into great States over a period of national expansion of some 60 years or more. Both Jefferson and Jackson had a hand in all that.

The Democratic Party was brought into existence by Jefferson, originally called the Republican Party—that is, the party of the Republic. It was Andrew Jackson who changed its name to the Democratic Party—that is, the party of the people. Both of these men had much to do with the formation of the party, and in doing so both were moved primarily by the desire of keeping the Government from the control of commercial autocrats and financial interests. Jefferson believed the Government, even in his early time, was approaching the danger line of moneyed control. When Jackson became President he found the powers of government not in the hands of an opposition party but wielded by the owners and directors of a powerful financial institution—a corporation created by law and called the United States Bank but privately owned by the Biddles of Philadelphia. Jackson contended that the Government as he found it was manned from top to bottom by men who owed their first allegiance to the Biddle Bank.

He ousted the bank-controlled officials from the Government service. He declared that men in the Federal employ should owe their first allegiance to the Government of the people and not to financial institutions, no matter how powerful. I say that was a sound principle and Jackson's great fight against the bank aroused hopes in every part of the country and in every American breast that thereafter every public official would owe his allegiance to the people he represented and not to some privately controlled institution, independent of the Government in principle but interwoven with its operations in every department created by the Constitution. [Applause.] The aphorism, "To the victors belong the spoils", expressed by William L. Marcy, of New York, at about that time, became a slogan of regeneration in political affairs and not, as Jackson's opponents sought to make it, a term of derision and cheap politics.

OFFICE SOUGHT JACKSON, NOT JACKSON THE OFFICE

Jackson was a man who knew his own limitations. He resigned from the supreme bench of Tennessee because he believed that his temperament was an executive one rather than a judicial one and that he felt he was not qualified by his early training for the place. He was an honest "resigner." If many of those who hold judicial positions today only had the discernment and the honest judgment of Jackson applied to their capabilities, there would be an exodus from the bench—local, State, and national. [Laughter and applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes more to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHANNON. As I said, Jackson was a "resigner." He resigned from the judicial bench; he resigned from this House; and he also resigned from the United States Senate. He was never an office seeker. It was the office always that sought Andrew Jackson. Tennessee conferred many honors on Jackson, and Jackson did honor to Tennessee. He was a hard fighter for the principles he believed in, and naturally he aroused bitter enmities. He was probably the most abused man of his time. Among other charges that were hurled at him was that he was not American born. It was alleged that he was born in Ireland, or if not in Ireland, on the high seas. It was known to be true that both of his brothers were born on the old sod. But Jackson settled the question by stating that he was born in South Carolina on March 15, 1767, and there was no proof that he was not. Jackson's word, when solemnly given, was accepted as the truth—indeed, it was a little dangerous to question it. And when Jackson said that he was born in South Carolina, South Carolina became his birthplace.

Jackson's faith was not attached merely to the principles of the Democratic Party—he believed, and believed with all the vehemence of his nature, that the Union was inseparable and eternal. Albert J. Beveridge, in his Life of Lincoln, said, concerning Jackson's great nullification proclamation:

> It was and to this day remains one of the foremost of state papers; and it was to be the model used by Lincoln 28 years later, when composing his first inaugural. All arguments that ever had or have since been advanced for national supremacy and against secession, were presented in Jackson's proclamation, and stated, too, with a moderation and kindly appeal that added to their compelling power.

Jackson's proclamation was received by the people of many sections of the country—especially by those statesmen who linked together the ideals of the Constitution and the preservation of the Union—with unqualified approval. Daniel Webster, who was to voice these ideals in his great speech in reply to Hayne, said of it at the time of its utterance that—

> Jackson's proclamation was wise and timely, that its principles were the true principles of the Constitution, and that he heartily approved of them, and that in meeting the crisis the President would have his cordial and entire support.

But in other quarters it brought down upon the head of Jackson an avalanche of abuse and an accumulation of political hatreds. He was denounced as a tyrant. It was said, "He has issued the edict of a dictator." One statesman of the opposition said, "It is always in the power of bad men to outrage a right by violence. General Jackson has not furnished the first example. There have been a Caesar, a Cromwell, and a Bonaparte." Another said, "If the Republic has found a master, let us not live his subjects."

ABOUT "OPPONENTS OF THE CONSTITUTION"

There seems to be a familiar ring in those partisan cries of 100 years ago. Today we are hearing a great deal about the Constitution, about liberty, about dictatorships and tyranny, and in view of the happenings of the last few years in the political world, one wonders at the sources and the inspiration of these clamorous cries that are now filling the political atmosphere everywhere. Back in my own home county I read recently the report of a speech made to students of a college by a Federal judge. He had a great deal to say about liberty and the Constitution, and among other things critically aimed at the present administration he referred quite often to the "opponents of the Constitution." Of course, his meaning was obvious. He was aiming his shafts of sarcasm at the Democratic Congress and the Democratic administration.

But let me venture the assertion that there was never a more false reference made than that involved in the phrase "opponents of the Constitution." I believe I will be fully supported in the assertion that there does not exist upon American soil today an "opponent of the Constitution", whether of my own political faith or any other. The Constitution as it stands today, with its many amendments made throughout the years to meet changing conditions, is universally accepted as the basic charter of our Nation. The opposition voiced is not, as this judicial gentleman would seek to infer, against the Constitution; it is, and should be, against equivocal interpreters of the Constitution. When a great public measure, designed honestly and sincerely to benefit the masses of our citizenry, is destroyed root and branch by a court's divided opinion—one branch declaring that "public welfare" is not involved, and the other declaring just as positively that "public welfare" is not only involved but at stake, such a judicial attitude cannot be lightly swept aside by denouncing its critics as "opponents of the Constitution." Who shall decide when doctors disagree? What is the law—the constitutional law—when its final interpreters cannot interpret alike so simple a phrase as "the public welfare"? If ever the voice and the spirit of a Jackson were needed, it seems to me it is sorely needed today. He was a constitutionalist to his inmost fighting soul, but he was a constitutionalist who found in that charter the guaranteed rights of the people.

So was Jefferson a constitutionalist—at least he became one when he succeeded in having the forgotten Bill of Rights included in it as its first 10 amendments. Between Jefferson and Jackson—men of very different temperaments—there was a deep-seated harmony of political opinion. Neither of them ever forgot their responsibility to the people; neither of them forgot the constitutional guaranty of a government of three great departments. You are hearing nowadays from these sons of liberty and sacred upholders of the Constitution great praises of the judicial branch of the Government. But when do you hear them praise this Congress of the United States, or the Executive who holds the highest and the most vital position in the land? Since when has the Constitution given sanction to continued abuse of the Congress, the lawmaking body provided by the Constitution, and of the Executive who holds the helm of state? Who, I would like to ask, are the real opponents of the Constitution—the men who uphold its provisions to the letter, or those who set themselves up to deride the Congress and to whisper calumnies and abuse on the head of the Executive?

Different in their temperaments as those two great statesmen of democracy were—Jefferson and Jackson—they stood together in their ideals of the Union and in their devotion to the basic ideals of a constitutional government operating through three great branches equal in authority and equal in power within the range of their prescribed duties.

A GREAT FUNCTION RECALLED

On April 13, 1830, which was the eighty-seventh anniversary of the birth of Thomas Jefferson, a great memorial banquet was held in the city of Washington. The banquet was attended by President Andrew Jackson, Vice President John C. Calhoun, members of the Cabinet, delegates from 24 States, and many party leaders of note, both in and out of Congress. Toasts were given by the delegates from the 24 States, the sentiments of which were based upon the political acts and opinions of Jefferson.

Let me recall three of the responses to the toasts of that banquet night—they will speak for themselves without comment:

Jackson spoke—and spoke eloquently and with fervor—upon the toast—

Our Federal Union—it must be preserved.

Vice President Calhoun, one of America's really great men, proposed this sentiment:

The Union: next to our liberties the most dear. May we all remember that it can only be preserved by respecting the rights of the States and distributing equally the benefits and burdens of the Union.

And to those two sentiments let me add the harmonizing one expressed by Martin Van Buren on that occasion:

Mutual forbearance and reciprocal concessions. Through their agency the Union was established. The patriotic spirit from which they emanated will forever sustain it.

It seems to me that the echoes that come down to us from that great banquet night and the great men—Democrats all of them—who there voiced the ideals of our constitutional government—well might be hearkened to in these days of partisan hatreds and confused counsels. They sound to me like very clear notes. There were no divided opinions among those great statesmen of Democracy.

DEATH SCENE OF ANDREW JACKSON

What a beautiful thing was the death scene of Andrew Jackson at the Hermitage, near Nashville, Tenn., June 8, 1845. As the hour of his death approached there were gathered about him the members of his household and many of his slaves. Observing that they were weeping, he beckoned to them and said:

Don't cry; gather closer; I am going to leave you, but we will soon meet again. We will all meet in heaven, both white and black.

Andrew Jackson could not envisage a heaven that would not admit all his friends, both black and white.

It should be kept in mind that Andrew Jackson was intended by his mother for the cloth. It was her wish that he be a Presbyterian minister. Jackson's parents left Ireland to escape the punishment that was meted out by the English Government to both Catholics and Presbyterians. The Jacksons were Presbyterians. Jackson, of course, bore an intense hatred for the English Government, as did his father. This hatred dated back to the sufferings of Grandfather Jackson at the siege of Carrickfergus, Ireland.

As Andrew grew up, and after his father and mother had

As Andrew grew up, and after his father and mother had died, he wandered off in the paths of adventure and became a bit willful. Two of his brothers died in the Revolutionary War. At the age of 14 he began fighting and he was a fighter to the end of his days. About 7 years before his death he affiliated himself with the Presbyterian Church in Nashville. Then his political enemies said, "The old devil, when he could not fight any more he joined the church." That was not the case at all. A certain amount of piety and reverence for religion had been instilled into him by his mother, who wished him to be a minister. He drifted along when she was no longer there to guide him. Nevertheless, all through his life he maintained a strong religious attitude.

Andrew Jackson left the Presidency more beloved than any other man who ever occupied that high office. In my time, most of the Presidents have left office with more or less bad feelings existing in some quarters. Jackson was more popular when he went out than when he became President. [Applause.]

CONTEMPORARY TRIBUTES

Let me now invoke the testimony of two eminent men of Jackson's day. First I will quote from Hon. Matthew Hall McAllister's eulogy on Andrew Jackson:

He knew that "Gold is the architect of power", and dreaded its influence upon the characters of his countrymen, and with it that baneful passion for gain which degrades a nation and converts freemen into speculators. His opposition to the incorporation of the money power raised up enemies more formidable than the foreign foe he had so gloriously vanquished. Amid the strife of contending parties, while many yielded and all wavered, he stood himself the bulwark of what he deemed the interests of the people against the gigantic power of monopoly.

I shall now quote from the eulogy by George Bancroft, the then Secretary of the Navy:

From the first, Jackson was attached to the fundamental doctrines of popular power and of the policy that favors it, and though his reverence for Washington surpassed his reverence for any human being, he voted against the address from the House of Representatives to Washington on his retirement, because its language appeared to sanction the financial policy which he believed hostile to republican freedom. * * *

From his home in Tennessee, Jackson came to the Presidency resolved to lift American legislation out of the forms of English legislation, and to place our laws on the currency in harmony with the principles of our Government. He came to the Presidency of the United States resolved to deliver the Government from the Bank of the United States, and to restore the regulation of exchanges to the rightful depository of that power—the commerce of the country. * * * And his first annual message announced to the country that the bank was neither constitutional nor expedient. In this he was in advance of the friends about him, in advance of Congress, and in advance of his party.

IS HISTORY REPEATING ITSELF?

It has been often said that history has a habit of repeating itself. I sometimes wonder if it is not repeating itself today. Andrew Jackson stood by the Union, but he also fought the money monopoly and the bankers' invisible government. He was denounced by their hired agents and newspapers as a dictator, a tyrant, a subverter of constitutional ideals, and an enemy of liberty. There was never a time when predatory interests failed to rally in the shadows of the Constitution, with their eyes on the Statue of Liberty and the American flag wrapped around their bodies. We are hearing many warnings about these bulwarks of government today. In that distant day Andrew Jackson never hesitated to take a position, he never lost a fight, either political or on the field of battle, he never sacrificed a principle, and he survived the assaults and the hatreds of his day and found a foremost place in American history.

Something seems to tell me that the spirit of Jackson is still potent, that history is again in many ways repeating itself, and that a victory for real constitutional liberty will be achieved by the party that is honored to remember its Jefferson and its Jackson as unwavering defenders of the freedom and the rights of the American people.

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. McGROARTY].

Mr. McGROARTY. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for 2 or 3 minutes to correct what perhaps might be a misapprehension. This afternoon's session opened with a very able speech by my beloved friend the distinguished gentleman from New England [Mr. GIFFORD], in which he attacked the economic soundness and advisability of the Townsend old-age pension plan. We thought that if no reply was made that the impression might go abroad throughout the House and throughout the country that the gentleman from Massachusetts had annihilated the Townsend plan, that it was all done and dead and passed away. My purpose is to inform you that such is far from being the case. While the gentleman from Massachusetts may have made a number of untrue statements, he made at least one true statement, which is that the Townsend plan must be met. No truer statement than that ever emanated from any Member of the House. The Townsend plan is the most phenomenal movement in the political history of the United States. Instead of having become moribund it is the livest thing at this hour in America. During the past 7 days alone 260 new Townsend clubs have been organized in the United States. That is the rate at which the movement is growing. Certainly it must be met, and let no one think it may not be met. There will be no rest for this Congress, or succeeding Congresses, or for the country until this plan be met. We have the strength, we have the numbers, and we are going to force it to an issue, both inside and outside of Congress. I am not saying that at all in the nature of a threat, but simply for your information, so that no one will be deluded in mistaking that the Townsend plan can be set aside. It cannot be done. It must be met.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGROARTY. Yes.

Mr. BOILEAU. Does the gentleman intend to present the bill as he last introduced it, or is there any talk among those who are sponsoring the legislation in this body to change it materially?

Mr. McGROARTY. No. I think we will offer the bill as I last introduced it.

Mr. BOILEAU. With the transaction tax?

Mr. McGROARTY. And ask for amendments on the floor of the House in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BOILEAU. Does the gentleman propose to advocate the transaction tax as a means for raising money for the payment of the pension?

Mr. McGROARTY. It is in the bill, and that will be the bill that will be pressed. If the gentleman, or any other Member objects to that transaction tax, he has the privilege on the floor of seeking to amend it.

Mr. BOILEAU. The difficulty is that that is the only way in which a sufficient amount of money could be raised to pay this pension of $200 a month. I was talking to a Townsend organizer in my district; and when I presented to him the fact that the operation of the transaction tax would be such as to wipe out all independent businessmen, he said, "Maybe they will change that."

Mr. McGROARTY. The gentleman will have the privilege of offering an amendment on the floor.

Mr. BOILEAU. That is true; but is it intended to insist on this transaction tax?

Mr. McGROARTY. I do not have time to argue the bill now.

Mr. BOILEAU. I think it is of sufficient importance to the Members of this House now to know.

Mr. McGROARTY. This is not the time or the hour. We will bring it up as soon as we have an opportunity, and it can all be discussed at that time.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MORAN. I yield the gentleman from California 2 additional minutes.

Mr. McGROARTY. Now, just one other matter of a personal nature.

I understood the calendar today called for appropriations. Somebody has appropriated my overcoat. [Applause and laughter.] At Christmas time Mrs. McGroarty astounded me by presenting me in Los Angeles, from a fine tailoring establishment, a $100 overcoat.

Mr. EKWALL. Is it a revolving overcoat? [Laughter.]

Mr. McGROARTY. Yes. It has revolved into somebody else's hands. [Laughter.] I was amazed and distressed to think that Mrs. McGroarty should spend that much money on an overcoat for me, because I did not think God ever intended that I should wear a hundred-dollar overcoat. But it is gone, Mr. Chairman. I want to suggest that some older Member—I mean older in term of service and not in years—suggest some measure of protecting property. One of my colleagues had his entire wardrobe stolen from his office in the House Office Building.

There are thieves around here. [Laughter.] Perhaps not here. You may remember the cartoon of Andy Gump, when Min wakened him in the night and said, "Andy, there is a robber in the house." Andy yawned and rubbed his eyes and said, "No; not in the House; maybe in the Senate." [Laughter.] I do not mind losing this overcoat. I had no business to have such an overcoat in the beginning. [Laughter.] But you men have overcoats, and I do not want to see you lose them. We do not wear overcoats in California. We do not need them. I brought it here because they said it would be cold in Washington. But, Mr. Chairman, something really ought to be done. Of course, it was no Member of this House. It may have been some tourist who passed through here. I left it at half past 10 o'clock in the morning, and there was not a soul in the Speaker's lobby. They could steal anything. They could steal the lobby if they wanted to. [Laughter and applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU].

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I had no intention of taking any of the time of the House this afternoon. The gentleman from California [Mr. MCGROARTY] made a statement with which I am in hearty accord. He said that the Townsend plan is one of the most important issues confronting the people at this time. Certainly there is no issue before the American people that has so captured the imagination of the people as has that plan. There has been so much misunderstanding, so much misinformation, so much prejudice, that I believe most of the people of this country do not thoroughly and fully understand the provisions of that plan.

I am not going to attempt in this short time to make an analysis of the plan or to attempt to reply to the many arguments made in its behalf. However, when the gentleman from California had the floor, I referred to the transaction tax which is proposed as a means for raising this money. I believe that this 2-percent transaction tax will raise a sufficient amount of money to pay this $200-a-month pension, but I want to predict that the use of a 2-percent transaction tax as a means of raising the money to pay this pension will ruin each and every small businessman in this country. It would be impossible for the independent merchant, for example, to compete with the chain-store system, because the independent merchant buys his merchandise through a system that requires many transactions, with the result that there would be multiple taxes; whereas the chain-store system has a more simplified system of distribution that avoids many transactions and would have a decided advantage over the independent businessman. The independent merchant simply could not compete with the chain-store system. The same would be true in other lines of business. The large industrial organizations own the complete unit of production and are not required to buy as much of the component parts of the finished product as do their smaller independent competitors and would therefore have the advantage of not being required to pay as great a tax. The result would be a tendency to avoid transaction taxes through combines, mergers, and consolidations. Great corporations would become larger and more powerful, and what business is still in the hands of small industrial units would be forced to pool their assets with others and thus form more large industrial corporations. The small business institutions that have done so much to develop our country and its traditions would be cast into oblivion.

I challenge those men who sponsor the Townsend plan to come upon the floor of this House and say whether or not they favor that kind of tax. If they do not favor it, then for God's sake let them tell the people throughout the country that they favor adequate old-age pensions, but that they cannot approve of the transaction-tax feature of the Townsend plan. If they do favor the transaction tax, let them admit to the American people that they are willing to destroy independent business in America. They must assume the natural consequences of such a tax measure.

There are many Members of this body who say, "We are just working on this plan in the hope of getting some kind of compromise." What do they want to compromise? Do they want to compromise the amount from $200 down to $50, as they tried to do during the last session? If that is the case, why do they call it the $200-a-month Townsend plan? If they want to knock out the transaction tax and put some other form of tax in its place, then why in the name of common sense do they not have the courage to say so?

They know, as does every other intelligent American citizen, that it is impossible to pay $200 a month old-age pension, or anything near that amount, unless the money is raised by a transaction tax. A sufficient amount of money cannot possibly be raised by any other form of tax. The issue is squarely before us. We have a responsibility to the millions of old folks in this country who are looking to this Congress, believing that the Townsend pension plan will be enacted into law during this session. We have the responsibility of bringing this matter out in the open and upon the floor of this House. If we are going to amend the present law, let us do so immediately.

If we are going to turn down the Townsend plan, let us do so at once. I, for one, favor bringing the plan out in the open without delay. Should the Townsend plan be brought up on the floor of the House, with its present unworkable provisions, I shall most assuredly vote against it, because I could not conscientiously support any legislation that would impose a 2-percent transactions tax and thereby ruin independent business and place such a terrific, unbearable burden upon the workers of the Nation.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I suppose that each and every Member has received petitions such as I have received. The type of letter—the type of demand—that has been made upon us as Members of Congress is entirely within the rights of those who address us; but I assure you, my friends, that, so far as I am concerned, the type of letter that I am receiving is not going to frighten me into supporting legislation that I know to be unsound and un-American. I am willing that any of my constituents or any other citizen of this great country shall express himself to me, in writing or verbally, giving me his or her views on any proposed piece of legislation; but when I receive petitions and letters to the effect that my political career is dependent upon my support of this or any other legislative proposal, then I want to say to the world that I am ready and willing that a test be made at the next election, because I would much rather retire to private life than to vote for a monstrosity—for a piece of legislation which I know would disrupt our entire economic structure, a piece of legislation which no Member of this House, so far as I know, has thus far attempted to defend on this floor.

I have heard speeches for old-age pensions. I recall that last year when the social-security bill was up for consideration certain Members sponsoring the Townsend plan made glowing and appealing speeches for old-age pensions; made statements about how we should take care of the aged. Good God! We all agree with that, we all recognize our responsibility to the aged, and many of us are ready and willing to go a great deal further than the present law provides with reference to social-security legislation. The few advocates of the Townsend plan in this body have never defended its principal provisions upon this floor, and I say with a firm conviction that there is not a man in this House who can or will attempt to defend the transaction tax embodied in this plan upon the floor of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MONAGHAN.]

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Chairman, I am glad the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU] is anxious that the Townsend plan be brought to the floor of the House for a full consideration and discussion of that problem, which, as he and others have so well stated today, has captivated and captured the imagination of the American public. To that end I urge all Members to sign the petition on the Clerk's desk which would bring the McGroarty bill to the floor for such consideration and vote.

Why has the Townsend plan captured the imagination of the American public? It has captured the imagination of the American public because there is a real need for an adequate old-age pension. I may say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that I, too, have disagreed with the means of raising the revenue, and that I am not one of those negative critics who has nothing to offer in the way of positive and affirmative action. It was at my instigation that the inheritance, income, and gift taxes were added to the revised McGroarty bill.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONAGHAN. I yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. Does the gentleman believe that we could pay a $200-a-month pension, or even a $100-a-month pension, without a transaction tax?

Mr. MONAGHAN. Yes; with a sufficiently high income, inheritance, and gift tax we could easily pay an adequate pension in the neighborhood of $100 and perhaps up to $200 a month.

Mr. BOILEAU. To every person over 60 years of age, regardless of his economic needs?

Mr. MONAGHAN. Yes.

Mr. BOILEAU. I respect the gentleman's opinion, but every economist who appeared before the committee disagreed with that theory.

Mr. MONAGHAN. I do not believe in economists, because the economists that I know are the paid hirelings and tools of Wall Street. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOILEAU. The gentleman would have to increase the tax about seven or eight times.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONAGHAN. Yes.

Mr. LUNDEEN. As I understand, the inheritance, gift, and income taxes are in the bill now.

Mr. MONAGHAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I wish to call attention to the fact that such a provision was in the Lundeen bill. I am very happy the gentleman has it in his bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONAGHAN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the 2-percent sales or transaction tax the gentleman and Dr. Townsend propose in this Townsend measure apply to all commodities, or are the necessities of life excluded?

Mr. MONAGHAN. As I understand it, I may say to the gentleman from Texas that the transactions tax applies to all commodities; in fact, to all transactions.

Mr. BLANTON. It applies to all commodities?

Mr. MONAGHAN. The transaction tax covers every transaction of whatever nature that might occur in the commercial or business world.

Mr. BLANTON. Then the 2-percent transaction tax would cover the purchase of every bottle of milk and every loaf of bread?

Mr. MONAGHAN. That is correct; and I believe the answer to the question whether or not the public is willing to sustain this tax is the very urgent demand of constituents that have virtually left Members of this Congress trembling to almost the status of the earthquake that occurred in the State of Montana because of the political consequences that may occur from a defiance of the will of the people whom they represent.

Mr. EKWALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONAGHAN. No; I cannot yield further.

Mr. EKWALL. The gentleman does not mean to say that the Members of this Congress are trembling as the State of Montana did recently?

Mr. MONAGHAN. I refuse to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. EKWALL. There will be plenty of them who will not tremble. Do not worry about that.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Chairman, outside of the question of the Townsend plan there is another question that this Congress must ultimately face dispassionately, fearlessly, and honestly. I am not so naive as to say that I support the Constitution when the Constitution suits my demand, as is the case with the Liberty League and with the businessmen and manufacturers' associations. I believe in the Constitution in its entirety, whether it pinches my foot or not.

Let us follow the Constitution of the United States and we will not have any more depressions. Let us follow the Constitution of the United States and we will not have any more violations and overthrowing of the rights of the people who send us here.

Article III, section 2, of the Constitution of the United States clearly sets forth the duty of Congress with respect to the judicial power:

> In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases before mentioned the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions, and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

Read the Constitution of the United States and you will find there is clearly a remedy in it for the judicial oligarchy that Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson, both of whom have been lauded here this afternoon, clearly fought. In the case of the Bank of the United States Andrew Jackson fought usurpation of power of the Congress. Jefferson said:

> Like a thief in the night, the judiciary has usurped powers until finally there has grown up a judicial oligarchy in this country.

The theory of American Government is not the theory of judicial government. It is the theory of representative government. Men like you and I have been sent here to voice and express the will of the people. Every 2 years the constitutional fathers wisely provided for a change in the lower House in order that anything derogatory to what they believed the Constitution should mean would be repealed and rescinded, not what nine men, above the wish and approval of the people and beyond power of removal, might believe to be the wish and will of the people as expressed in the Constitution of the United States.

The Constitution of the United States clearly defines the powers of the judiciary; and I challenge any Member of either the House or the Senate—in fact, I challenge the Supreme Court itself—to show one phrase in the Constitution of the United States that gives it the power to negative and nullify and to declare unconstitutional an act of Congress.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONAGHAN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Under the Constitution the Congress has no power whatever to tax all the people for the benefit of a certain class. Nowhere in the Constitution is there power given to Congress to tax all the people in order to pay a gratuity to any particular class.

Mr. MONAGHAN. I believe the gentleman has stated the proposition correctly.

Mr. BLANTON. Then how could you tax all the people of the United States to pay a gratuity to those who are 65 years of age and over?

Mr. MONAGHAN. I may say to the gentleman from Texas that this Congress knows the Constitution of the United States, and the Congress has, under the Constitution of the United States, enacted the A. A. A., the Railroad Pension Act, and other acts, as acts of taxation for the benefit of the people, and the Constitution provides taxing power "to promote the general welfare." Therefore, I believe that under the general-welfare clause of the Constitution of the United States, which is set forth not only in the preamble of the Constitution but in the Constitution itself, we have ample authority to do things that will preserve this Union which today needs preservation more than at any time in its history.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONAGHAN. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. Without getting into a discussion of any particular bill—and I may say that I have rather fixed views of my own—is my understanding correct that the gentleman takes the position there is no limitation on the power of the Congress?

Mr. MONAGHAN. I take the view, I may say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the only check upon this Congress in the matter of the Constitution of the United States is the people of the United States themselves.

Mr. McCORMACK. The Federal Government has delegated enumerated powers, and the people, who are the sovereign power, speak through the Constitution. Through the Constitution they have created our fundamental rights and have created a structure called Government. Now, the Government may do only those things which the people have permitted it to do through the Constitution itself, the people's mouthpiece.

Mr. MONAGHAN. I do not agree that the Constitution of the United States is the people's mouthpiece. I believe that the people's mouthpiece sits right here before me in the Congress of the United States, and that the people's leader is in the White House, where he properly belongs.

Mr. McCORMACK. Then what is the Constitution, if it is not the means by and through which the sovereign body of America speaks?

Mr. MONAGHAN. The Constitution is the guide by which we, the spokesmen of the people, are to be guided.

Mr. McCORMACK. Does it determine our powers?

Mr. MONAGHAN. It does.

Mr. McCORMACK. Who, in turn, then, determines whether or not we have exceeded our power?

Mr. MONAGHAN. The people. That is what I am saying with reference to the Townsend plan. The people will determine whether or not they believe we are doing what is constitutional in that respect or not.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONAGHAN. I could hardly yield to the other gentleman and refuse to yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Does the gentleman from Montana believe that Dr. Townsend is God's gift to the people?

Mr. MONAGHAN. I will let the gentleman answer that question himself. I can only say that long before Dr. Townsend ever thought of an old-age-pension plan I had introduced one. I believe every Member of the Congress knows that my interest in old-age pensions is not a political one, because it antedated any Townsend move. I circulated a petition to block the adjournment of Congress in 1934, with the resultant effect that a railroad pension was placed upon the statute books, and I did likewise in 1935 with the same resultant effect.

I believe in pensions as a means of bringing about prosperity; as a means not only of bringing security to the aged people when in their declining years of life they are unable to gain a livelihood for themselves, with their eyesight weak, their hands infirm in grasping the throttle of motors, when their backs are stooped, and when they themselves are unable to carry on their normal duties, but also as a means of preserving the Union and establishing justice and giving employment to the thousands and thousands of young hopeful men and women who are leaving the colleges and universities of this country, only to find that they are lucky to get relief, as one young man who came into my office and begged, not for a job but for relief, with the expectancy of an addition in his family within 2 weeks. I am pleading for these people.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Montana 3 additional minutes.

Mr. MONAGHAN. I hope the Congress of the United States will realize that we have a duty to the people of this Nation to enact something that will serve this end, even if it does not completely satisfy the demands of those who expect $200 a month. I hope the Congress will build up an adequate pension system in this country.

As an example of what the effectiveness of such a plan would be, permit me to cite you to Three Forks, Mont., a town which is exclusively a railroad center, wherein the establishment of the railroad pension and its operation resulted in the reemployment of every unemployed railroad man, and I have it upon good authority that the railroads actually had to seek trainmen and put them in apprentice service and train them. The one way that selfish industry cannot escape, the one way of doing justice not only to the aged but to the youth who are coming up, is to establish a satisfactory, adequate pension system.

Delude the aged? The only ones that the Congress of the United States are deluding if they do not establish an adequate pension system at this session of the Congress are themselves, because it is conceded in private and political circles and in the cloakrooms and everywhere that you hear Congressmen talk that this is the one issue that is going to be the vital, determining factor in the next congressional election.

I do not say this by way of threat. I believe, hope, and trust in the confidence and good judgment of the Congress of the United States that it will see this problem as it has that of the railroad men and establish an adequate pension for all men in all industry, and in this way bring about real prosperity. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOLAND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9863, the independent offices bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. SCHNEIDER of Wisconsin, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for 3 days, on account of important business.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, January 9, 1936, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

561. A letter from the Director General of the United States Constitution Sesquicentennial Commission, transmitting pursuant to a resolution of Congress, approved August 23, 1935, a report recommending the enabling legislation which should be enacted by the Congress for a comprehensive observance of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the formation of the Constitution of the United States (H. Doc. No. 311); to the Committee on the Library and ordered to be printed with illustrations.

562. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the annual report of the sale of war supplies, covering the disposal of surplus property in the possession of the War Department within the United States during the period, October 15, 1934, to October 15, 1935, inclusive; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

563. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a combined statement of the receipts and expenditures, balances, etc., of the Government during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1935 (H. Doc. No. 346); to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and ordered to be printed.

564. A letter from the Public Printer, transmitting the annual report of the Public Printer, covering the operations of the Government Printing Office for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1935; to the Committee on Printing.

565. A letter from the Postmaster General, transmitting a report of all cases where special contracts have been made with railroad companies for the transportation of the mails, and the terms and reasons therefor; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

566. A letter from the Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, transmitting an ad interim report of the Federal Trade Commission with respect to the sale and distribution of milk and milk products (H. Doc. No. 387); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and ordered to be printed.

567. A letter from the Acting Director of the Bureau of the Budget, transmitting a letter from the administrative assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury submitting a list of persons employed in the Procurement Division, Public Works Branch, Treasury Department, and paid from the appropriation, "General expenses of public buildings" during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1935; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

568. A letter from the Postmaster General, transmitting the cost ascertainment report for the fiscal year 1935; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

569. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting the draft of a proposed bill to authorize the exchange of land between the Waianae Co. and the Navy Department; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

570. A letter from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting a statement showing the names of those for whom work has been performed, the nature of the services rendered, the price charged for these services, and the manner in which the moneys received were deposited or used in regard to the act of May 27, 1935 (Public, No. 74); to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

571. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the report of the National Bituminous Coal Commission; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

572. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the draft of a bill to authorize appropriations for construction at military posts on the island of Oahu, Territory of Hawaii, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

573. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a draft of a bill to authorize the Secretary of War to acquire the timber rights on the Gigling Military Reservation (now designated as Camp Ord) in California; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

574. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the draft of a bill to repeal an act of March 3, 1933, entitled "An act to provide for the transfer of powder and other explosive materials from deteriorated and unserviceable ammunition under the control of the War Department to the Department of Agriculture for use in land clearing, drainage, road building, and other agricultural purposes", and copy of letter to Secretary of War dated October 25, 1935; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

9423. By Mr. COCHRAN: Memorial of all Italian organizations of St. Louis, Mo., submitted by Cav. A. Jos. Freschi, presidente generale, regarding neutrality bills; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

9424. By Mr. CULKIN: Petition of 10 residents of Oneida, Madison County, N. Y., favoring the Townsend plan; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

9425. Also, petition of Lewis County (N. Y.) Pomona Grange, requesting a tax on all oleomargarine products equal to the tax on butterfat, and urging that the import duties and excise taxes be increased at least 5 cents per pound on all oleo products; to the Committee on Agriculture.

9426. By Mr. CURLEY: Resolution of the Warehousemen's Association of the Port of New York, Inc., urging the United States Government to withdraw from private operation terminal properties located at the Army base piers, Brooklyn, N. Y.; Shipping Board piers at Hoboken, N. J.; Army base at Boston, Mass.; Shipping Board piers at Philadelphia, Pa.; and the Army base properties at Norfolk, Va.; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

9427. By Mr. DELANEY: Petition of the Abraham Lincoln Independent Political Club, Inc., of Brooklyn, N. Y., declaring that the United States embargo on petroleum products is a heavy and unreasonable burden upon the Italian people who are friendly and at peace with our country; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

9428. By Mr. JOHNSON of Texas: Petition of E. Hawkins, vice president, Ennis State Bank; J. W. Tolleson, president, Citizens National Bank of Ennis; Felis Atwood, chairman, Democratic executive committee of Ellis County; Burr Lumber Co.; William Cameron & Co.; Ennis Lumber Co., all of Ennis, Tex., endorsing title I of the National Housing Act, and requesting that legislation be enacted to continue it beyond April 1, 1936; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

9429. By Mr. RICH: Petition from the United Brethren Church of Duke Center, Pa., for the amendment of the Constitution; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

9430. By Mr. PFEIFER: Petition of Quality Bakers of America, New York City, concerning House bill 9101; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

9431. Also, petition of United Textile Workers of America, Francis J. Gorman, first vice president, Washington, D. C., concerning House bill 9072; to the Committee on Labor.

9432. By Mr. RUDD: Petition of National Corps, Army and Navy Union, U. S. A., favoring the immediate cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

9433. By Mr. RICH: Petition from Tioga County (Pa.) Center Grange, No. 929, Patrons of Husbandry, favoring a 10-cent tax on oleomargarine, also a tax on oils and fats imported in the manufacture of oleomargarine; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE

THURSDAY, JANUARY 9, 1936

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian.

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Heavenly Father, fountain and full treasure of all goodness, who hast brought us forth to radiant birth with latent powers over the untoward forces of a seething world: Grant that we may understand Thy perfect plan for us, and never lay aside our royal gifts, nor claim for parentage the dust; but, as we are of Thine own substance made, help us to face our daily tasks, conscious of Thy great intent to speak through us the word of life that shall make men unafraid.

And when the mists lie low upon the hills, and night draws nigh, bring us to our rest weary and content and undishonored in this day of serving Thee. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

ELLISON D. SMITH, a Senator from the State of South Carolina, appeared in his seat today.

PROTECTION OF PURITY OF FOODS

Mr. GIBSON. I present a memorial in the form of a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Vermont with respect to the so-called Copeland pure-food bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be printed in the RECORD in accordance with the rule and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The resolution is as follows:

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives, That the members of the Vermont delegation in Congress be requested to lend their favorable support to a proposed amendment to the Copeland pure-food laws, so that decolorized maple sirup should be labeled as decolorized; and that copies of this resolution be sent to each member of the Vermont delegation in Congress.

FARM RELIEF AND THE SUPREME COURT DECISION ON A. A. A.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I desire at this time to place in the RECORD a few telegrams typical of those I have received since the momentous decision of the Supreme Court of the United States invalidating the Agricultural Adjustment Act and placing strict limitations on the power of the Federal Government to assist in restoring economic equality of opportunity to agriculture.

Most of the telegrams and letters coming to me do not complain of nor attack the decision, but they do point out that the decision does not solve the farm problem. And, as most of the telegrams come from farmers and farm organizations of my own State of Kansas, which has suffered severely from low prices of farm products and lack of purchasing power during most of the period since the end of the World War, it is not unnatural that they appeal to Congress for relief.

I find a general feeling among farmers that some of the benefits given industry through the protective tariff have been industrial benefits at the expense of agriculture. And they appeal for the equivalent of tariff benefits to be given to agriculture. Not being constitutional lawyers, it is difficult for our people to understand why legislation can be enacted which results in higher prices and protected markets for industry while it is declared impossible to enact legislation which will give similar benefits to agriculture. And I will even admit I myself am a little puzzled by this situation.

Mr. President, there can be no return of permanent national prosperity if agriculture must sell at an unprotected low-price level and buy at a protected high-price level. From the viewpoint of the national welfare, it is up to the Federal Government to find some means of correcting this inequality.

We must find a solution for this problem of inadequate returns to agriculture, resulting in lack of farm purchasing power, which in turn inevitably must result in idle factories and unemployed workers in industry. Not to attempt to do so is unthinkable. Not to do so will have most disastrous results not only to agriculture but to the entire Nation.

It is not my intention even to suggest the proper solution at this time. The problem is being worked on. I can and do pledge my best efforts to cooperate with all true friends of agriculture in working out the solution, and I hope and trust a solution is possible under the restrictions upon legislative action laid down in the recent decision.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks at this time the telegrams which I send to the desk.

There being no objection, the telegrams were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

YATES CENTER, KANS., January 6, 1936.

ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

We, the Farm Bureau members of Woodson County, assembled in annual meeting in Yates Center, Kans., do hereby petition you as Senator from our State use all your influence and every honorable means to secure such needed legislation at this session of Congress as will secure for the farmers of this United States parity prices for the products of their business activities.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES AND PRODUCTION CONTROL—PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

Mr. LOGAN. I introduce a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution to authorize the Congress to legislate concerning industrial disputes and production control. I ask that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 185) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to authorize the Congress to legislate concerning industrial disputes and production control was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid as a part of said Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States, to wit:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The Congress shall have power in the regulation of commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and within the Indian tribes, to provide by such law as the Congress shall deem necessary or desirable for—

"(1) The conciliation, arbitration, and settlement of industrial disputes of all persons, corporations, or other business associations of whatever description, and their employees, farmers excepted, whose products may move in or affect interstate or foreign commerce; and

"(2) For the regulation and control of the production of any agricultural, mineral, or manufactured product of whatever description which may move in or affect interstate or foreign commerce."

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I introduce a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which I ask may be appropriately referred. I also ask that a brief explanation of the proposed amendment may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 186) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The statement presented by Mr. SCHWELLENBACH is as follows:

The amendment to the Federal Constitution reads as follows:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. In addition to the methods of amending the Constitution provided in article V, amendments to the Constitution may be proposed by the Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, and shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution when ratified by a majority of the people voting in each of three-fourths of the several States at the next congressional election following the submission under this article, or at special elections which shall be held, on such date and in such manner as the President may prescribe, not less than 4 nor more than 6 months after the submission of the amendments to the States by the Congress, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress.

"SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

"SEC. 3. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by conventions in the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within 7 years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress."

The submission of an amendment of this kind is necessary in order to meet the very practical problems created by recent important decisions of the Supreme Court. Of particular importance among these decisions are those which declare unconstitutional the Railroad Employees' Retirement Act, the National Industrial Recovery Act, and the Agricultural Adjustment Act. A careful and sober consideration of the opinions in these cases must lead inevitably to the conclusion that the "commerce" and the "taxation for general welfare" clauses of the Constitution are not available to the Congress of the United States for the purpose of aiding in the solution of the economic problems of the people of this country. Any doubt which may have existed in the mind of anyone concerning the attitude of the Supreme Court must necessarily have been erased by the opinion of the majority in the Agricultural Adjustment Act decision. The Court is determined to strictly construe the Constitution and to limit the Federal Government to those enumerated powers expressly delegated to it. We need no longer hope for liberalism upon the part of the Supreme Court. When the Court failed to define general welfare and when it held that the production control agreements under the Agricultural Adjustment Act amounted to coercion, every practical-minded individual was met with the conclusion that the people of this country must look to the States and local communities for assistance in the solution of their economic problems. The people face that course or the only alternative, which is a constitutional amendment.

In the light of these decisions certain proposals have been made. They may be divided into two groups of two each. The first is that the Supreme Court be deprived of its power to pass upon the constitutionality of statutes enacted by the Congress. The second is that the size of the Court be increased and new members appointed who might be deemed to be favorable to a more liberal construction of the Constitution. Either of these two proposals necessarily involves the complete abandonment of a constitutional system of government in this country. It is my carefully considered opinion that there are too many people in this country who cherish the liberties guaranteed as the result of the democratic form of our Government and through the medium of the first 10 amendments to secure a favorable acceptance of either of these two proposals. I think there are too many people who have a reverence for the constitutional guaranty of freedom of speech, freedom of religious preference, freedom of the press, freedom within the home, and the other liberties guaranteed by the Constitution, to succeed in an outright abandonment of constitutional interpretation by the Court.

The third proposal is to amend the Constitution so as to extend generally the power of the Federal Government. The fourth proposal is through constitutional amendment to give the Federal Government certain definite powers, such as control over the hours of labor, the wages paid to employees, the control of production in agriculture, and similar proposals. In the consideration of the practicability of the third or fourth proposals we are met with the very forcible fact that in 1924 Congress submitted the child-labor amendment. After a period of over 11 years only 24 of the 48 States have ratified that amendment. During the year 1935, despite all of the talk concerning remedial legislation, of the 28 legislatures which met and had before them the question of ratification, the child-labor amendment was ratified by only 4 such legislatures. I think no one can disagree with the contention that the child-labor amendment is as humanitarian as any proposal ever made in this country. It certainly should meet with sympathetic consideration by any legislative body or the people of any State. Having during a period of over a decade failed to secure the ratification of this amendment, I cannot help but believe that either the third or fourth proposal would meet with a similar fate.

The next question presented is whether or not the amendment proposed by this resolution is subject to the objection interposed against the four proposals. Since under it the people themselves would retain the right to pass upon any proposed amendment, it avoids the objection to the first two proposals. Against it the objections to the third and fourth proposals are not tenable for the following reasons: (1) It does not in itself extend the powers of the Federal Government or change any of the system of government. In itself it only adds to the method of amendment to the Constitution. (2) After its adoption liberalizing amendments would be much easier and much more expeditious of ratification, for the reason that (a) the people themselves would do the ratifying and would be much more likely to ratify than would legislatures or constitutional conventions, for the reason that they would have presented to them the one issue as to the desirability of ratification; (b) the fact that the people did retain the right of ratification would remove from their minds the fear that if the amendments were not practicable they could not be repealed. I think one of the most potent factors that stands in the way of ratification of constitutional amendments is the necessarily slow and involved procedure now required before changes in that document may be made. This practical difficulty causes the Congress to be slow in the submission of amendments and causes the legislatures to be slow in the ratification of amendments.

I believe an amendment such as this is necessary to preserve our institution of democracy. We may well reread the concluding words of Story's Commentaries on the Constitution: "The future is that which may well awaken the most earnest solicitude, both for the virtue and the permanence of our Republic. The fate of other republics—their rise, their progress, their decline, and their fall—are written but too legibly on the pages of history, if indeed they were not continually before us in the startling fragments of their ruins. They have perished and perished by their own hands. * * * Such are the melancholy lessons of the past history of republics down to our own."

I call attention to the following very pertinent facts: First, that since the conclusion of the World War, of the 583,000,000 people living in Europe, 447,000,000 have been willing to give up their political freedom and to surrender their personal and political liberty to a dictator in order that they might thereby secure economic security. Second, that during 1934, despite all of the efforts made throughout the world, world trade of the combined 160 countries which reported totaled only $23,375,000,000 in gold value, which was $859,000,000 less than it was in the previous year, which has become looked upon as the lowest period of the depression, and which compares with $68,606,000,000 for 1929. Third, that all of the nations which are still attempting to remain on the gold standard are today facing more serious financial and economic trouble than they have faced at any time since the termination of the war. Unemployment in Czechoslovakia is 7.8 times what it was in 1929; in Belgium it is 14.8 times what it was in 1929; in France it is 37 times as much as it was in 1929; in Holland it is 3.9 times as much as it was in 1929; in Poland, 3.3 times as much as it was in 1929; in Switzerland, 4.4 times what it was in 1929. Fourth, the possibility of war is rife in every portion of the globe. There is no place where all the potentialities of war do not today exist. What we in America must avoid is the possibility that our people will follow the leadership of Europe and on the promise of economic security surrender their political rights and liberties.

To my mind, the most serious implication of the present impasse between the administration and the constitutional situation is the danger that from it will come a feeling of futility upon the part of the people. Mankind is and always has been patient. Revolutions come at the time when people feel that their governments are impotent to assist them in the solution of their problems. It is after the people come to the feeling that sincere efforts upon their part have been frustrated and that all further efforts are futile that they are willing to make a change in their form of government.

We in America are dangerously near that feeling of futility as the result of the action of the Supreme Court in nullifying every effort of the Congress to solve the economic problems of the people. The situation is too dangerous to be met by silent acquiescence. It requires definite and courageous action, which, in my opinion, can only come through the medium of a constitutional amendment which will give to the Federal Government the powers the people of the country feel it needs and should have for their protection. The amendment proposed in this resolution is the first and, in my opinion, the necessary step along that line.

PAYMENTS TO FARMERS UNDER A. A. A. CONTRACTS

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the recent decision by the United States Supreme Court touching the A. A. A. holds that contracts for the reduction of acreage and control by production are outside the range of Federal power.

The decision also holds that the Congress has no power to tax and to spend as the Agricultural Adjustment Act authorizes. This undoubtedly means that the contracts themselves are void and cannot be enforced by the Federal Government or by the farmer.

It must be borne in mind, however, that these contracts were made under an act of Congress which, at the time it was taken to the Court, was presumed to be within the terms of the Constitution. The Court having declared the act invalid, the question immediately arises as to the obligation of the Federal Government to those farmers who were in a position where they could not escape being damaged, in other words, where they had performed their part of the contract but had not been paid.

For instance, if the farmer, relying upon the contract, reduced his wheat acreage when he planted it in the fall of 1935, upon condition that he should be paid a certain amount by reason of such reduction in acreage, such farmer is presumed to have suffered damage to the extent of the amount that he would have received from the Government for last year's reduction in planting. This may be said to be only a moral obligation, but my recollection is that Governments are free to appropriate money to meet moral obligations. In all cases, therefore, where the farmer has already performed his part and the Government has not paid the amount agreed upon, the Congress must in good conscience provide payment. The fact that Congress exceeded its power in authorizing the making of such contracts is no reason for permitting the farmer to suffer who relied upon the act.

To meet that situation I am introducing a bill, which I ask unanimous consent to have appropriately referred and printed in the RECORD following my brief remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill (S. 3596) to provide for making rental and benefit payments to farmers who have made crop-adjustment contracts with the Secretary of Agriculture was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A bill to provide for making rental and benefit payments to farmers who have made crop-adjustment contracts with the Secretary of Agriculture

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated $300,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be available to the Secretary of Agriculture for the purpose of making rental and benefit payments which may now be, or which may hereafter become, due upon crop-adjustment contracts made by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. Said funds shall also be available for rental and benefit payments to farmers who have applied for contracts, and who prior to January 6, 1936, have in good faith made adjustments in acreage and otherwise complied with the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture in connection with a crop program, notwithstanding the fact that no contract has actually been signed. The sums authorized to be appropriated by this section may be used by the Secretary for all necessary administrative expenses in carrying out the provisions of this act.

H. R. 3421. An act to authorize credit in disbursing officers' accounts covering shipment of privately owned automobiles from October 12, 1927, to October 10, 1929;

H. R. 3912. An act to amend an act for the relief of Clarence R. Killion;

H. R. 5876. An act for the relief of Elmer H. Ackerson; and

H. R. 5964. An act for the relief of Carl F. Yeager; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

H. R. 1381. An act to amend Public Law No. 249, Seventy-first Congress, entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to dispose of material no longer needed by the Navy";

H. R. 1913. An act for the relief of James Luker, Sr.;

H. R. 5916. An act to authorize the conveyance by the United States to the State of Michigan of the former United States lighthouse supply depot, St. Joseph, Mich., for State naval force purposes;

H. R. 7486. An act to authorize the appointment of midshipmen from among honor graduates of "honor schools" and from among members of the Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps; and

H. R. 8872. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to deliver to the custody of the Woman's Club, of the city of Paducah, Ky., the silver service in use on the U. S. S. Paducah; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

SUPPLEMENTAL AND DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS AMENDMENT

Mr. HAYDEN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 9215, the supplemental and deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

At an appropriate place in the bill, to insert the following:

"That section 1 of the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935, approved April 8, 1935, be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting at the end of the first proviso of the second paragraph thereof a new proviso, as follows:

"'Provided further, That the apportionment requirements of this paragraph shall not apply to loans or grants, or both, to States under limitation (g) of the first paragraph of this section, for public highways and related projects, including grade crossings.'"

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

On motion of Mr. COPELAND, the Committee on the District of Columbia was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 3025) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for disability or death resulting from injury to employees in certain employments in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes", approved May 17, 1928, and for other purposes, and it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ADDITIONAL COPIES OF THE LIFE AND MORALS OF JESUS

Mr. FLETCHER submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 26), which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound, with illustrations, by the photolithographic process, in such style and manner as may be directed by the Joint Committee on Printing, 9,000 copies of House Document No. 755, Fifty-eighth Congress, second session, entitled "The Life and Morals of Jesus of Nazareth", by Thomas Jefferson, as the same appears in the National Museum, of which 3,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 6,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

ADDIE MOORE TRINKLE

Mr. BYRD submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 216), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the appropriation for miscellaneous items, contingent fund of the Senate, fiscal year 1935, to Addie Moore Trinkle, widow of Clarence M. Trinkle, late an employee in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, a sum equal to 6 months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

INVESTIGATION AND COORDINATION OF EXECUTIVE AGENCIES

Mr. BYRD submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 217), which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That there is hereby established a Senate committee to be composed of five Senators, of whom three shall be from the majority political party and two shall be from the minority political party, to be appointed by the President of the Senate. The committee is authorized and directed to make a full and complete study of all the activities of the departments, bureaus, boards, commissions, independent agencies, and all other agencies of the executive branch of the Government, with a view to determining whether the activities of any such agency conflict with or overlap the activities of any other such agency and whether, in the interest of simplification, efficiency, and economy, any of such agencies, any officials and employees thereof, should be coordinated with other agencies or abolished. The committee shall report to the Senate at the beginning of the session of 1937 the results of its investigations, together with its recommendations, of any, for necessary legislation.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Senate, to employ such experts, and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, and to take such testimony and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $50,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

WAR DEBTS, DISARMAMENT, CURRENCY STABILIZATION, AND WORLD TRADE

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Resolutions coming over from a previous day are in order.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the resolution (S. Res. 141), submitted by Mr. TYDINGS on May 21, 1935, favoring conferences with foreign governments on war debts and certain other international matters.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the resolution go over for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

INDUSTRY AND BUSINESS COMMITTEE FOR N. R. A.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the resolution (S. Res. 142), submitted by Mr. NYE on May 21, 1935, making inquiry as to whether members of the industry and business committee for N. R. A. extension are, or have been, officials or employees of the National Recovery Administration or of code authorities.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the resolution go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

APPOINTMENT AND CONFIRMATION OF CERTAIN FEDERAL EMPLOYEES

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the resolution (S. Res. 152), submitted by Mr. GORE on June 15, 1935, calling on Comptroller General for information concerning appointees or employees of the Government receiving compensation at the rate of $4,000 per annum or more.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the resolution go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will go over.

FINANCIAL CONDITION OF GOVERNMENT

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the resolution (S. Con. Res. 20), submitted by Mr. MCNARY and Mr. HASTINGS on July 1, 1935, providing for a recess of the two Houses, the study by committees of the financial condition of the Government, and the consideration of a revenue bill upon reconvening.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the occasion for the resolution having entirely passed, I ask that the concurrent resolution be indefinitely postponed. I assume the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] will have no objection.

Mr. HASTINGS. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the concurrent resolution will be indefinitely postponed.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF BITUMINOUS COAL CONSERVATION BILL

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the resolution (S. Res. 167) calling upon the Attorney General for an opinion with respect to the constitutionality of H. R. 8479, the Bituminous Coal Conservation Act of 1935, submitted by Mr. BYRD on July 9, 1935.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the resolution go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will go over. Morning business is closed.

ESTABLISHMENT OF AIR CORPS TECHNICAL SCHOOL

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, there is a special order for today, the bill (S. 3398) to establish the Air Corps Technical School and to acquire certain land in the State of Colorado for use as a site for said Air Corps Technical School and as an aerial gunnery and bombing range for the Army Air Corps. I am informed by Senators who are especially concerned about the bill that it is impossible for them to be present today. I ask that the special order stand as the order of business for the next day on which the Senate is in session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, do I understand correctly that the Senator from Arkansas proposes that the special order shall go over for the day?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. Is it the intention of the Senator that the Senate shall recess over until Monday?

Mr. ROBINSON. My intention is to move that the Senate adjourn until Monday at the conclusion of today's business.

Mr. McNARY. Very well; I have no objection.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, it is my understanding that the priority of the bill just referred to by the leaders on both sides of the Chamber will not be lost by virtue of the unanimous-consent agreement. Is that a proper assumption?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The understanding of the Chair is that that is the parliamentary situation.

There being no objection, the special order will stand as requested by the Senator from Arkansas.

PATRICK HENRY AND JOHN RANDOLPH—ADDRESS BY HON. WILLIAM CABELL BRUCE

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, recently Mr. William Cabell Bruce, formerly a Senator from the State of Maryland, delivered a notable address on Patrick Henry and John Randolph, at Charlotte Court House, Va., November 4, 1935. I ask unanimous consent that the address may be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, it is a noteworthy fact that the two most striking tributes that have ever been paid to the intellectual character of the old Virginia society have been paid by two bitter New England sectionalists, Henry Adams and Henry Cabot Lodge. Of that society Adams says, in his Life of John Randolph of Roanoke: "This small, cheerful world * * * produced the greatest list of great names ever known this side of the ocean"; and of the same society Lodge says, in his Life of George Washington: "We must go back to Athens to find another instance of a society so small in numbers, and yet capable of such an outburst of ability and force." It was in the bosom of this community that the two famous men, whose names are indestructibly linked with the history of this county, Patrick Henry and John Randolph, were born and nurtured. Of Henry it may be safely said that he belongs to the same category of supreme orators as Demosthenes, Cicero, Chatham, and Mirabeau. Of that contemporary testimony of the most impressive character leaves us no room to doubt. Silas Deane, of Connecticut, who served in the Continental Congress with Henry, declares that he was the "completest speaker" that he had ever heard. Chief Justice John Jay, of New York, who also served with Henry in the Continental Congress, pronounced him on one occasion "the greatest of orators." This statement was made by Jay to Justice Iredell as Henry was about to begin his masterly argument in the celebrated British Debtors' cause at Richmond; and so deeply impressed, we are told, was Justice Iredell by this argument, that at one point in it he relieved his overwrought feelings with the exclamation, "Gracious God! He is an orator, indeed."

Of Henry, George Mason, a man of the first order of wisdom, among those who acted on the theater of the American Revolution, in the opinion of Jefferson, also said, "He is, by far, the most powerful speaker I ever heard." Of Henry, John Randolph, too, said, on one occasion, that the united powers of painting and eloquence could, alone, give a faint idea of what he was; on another, that "he spake as never man spake"; on another, that "he was Shakespeare and Garrick combined"; and on another, that "when Henry was speaking one felt like whispering to his neighbor, "Hush; don't stir, don't speak, don't breathe!" On still another occasion, when he was referring in the House of Representatives to a bill providing for a State-wide election for Presidential electors, which had been carried in the Virginia House of Delegates by a Democratic majority of only five votes, Randolph confidently affirmed: "Had Patrick Henry lived and taken his seat in the assembly, that law would never have been passed. In that case the electoral votes of Virginia would have been divided and Mr. Jefferson lost his election. Five votes, Mr. Chairman! Patrick Henry was good for five times five votes, doubled, in that body."

In his autobiography, Jefferson tells us that as a law student at Williamsburg he attended the debate in the House of Burgesses of Virginia over the Stamp Act and heard, to use his own words, "the splendid display of Mr. Henry's talents as a popular orator." "They were", he adds, "great, indeed; such as I have never heard from any other man. He appeared to me to speak as Homer wrote." In another place in his autobiography, Jefferson speaks of "the poetical fancy of Mr. Henry, his sublime imagination, his lofty and overwhelming diction."

Very glowing, too, is the description given us of Henry, as an orator, by the celebrated Presbyterian divine, Dr. Archibald Alexander, a preacher, for a time, in this county, and the first professor of the theological seminary, at Princeton. After assigning the chief place among Henry's rhetorical endowments to his "emotion and passion", he declares that Henry never indulged in an expression that was not instantly accepted as nature itself, and that he could not have achieved his oratorical triumphs but for a "matchless perfection of the organs of expression, including the entire apparatus of voice, intonation, pause, gesture, attitude, and indescribable play of countenance." "Caesar had his Brutus, Charles the First his Cromwell, and George the Third may profit by their example. If that be treason, make the most of it." These are familiar words from the lips of Henry that will endure as long as human civilization shall endure, and pass along with them, as they go, will that other flaming utterance of Henry's: "I know not what course others may take, but as for me, give me liberty or give me death." Imagine what one of us would feel if he could hear such words as those when set off by the matchless perfection of the organs of expression of which Dr. Alexander speaks. How world-wide, too, must have been the fame which caused Byron, an English poet, to picture Henry as

The forest-born Demosthenes
Whose thunder shook the Philip of the Seas!

When the people of this county come to place upon the walls of their historic courthouse the portrait of such a man as this, it seems to me that they might well do it almost in the reverent spirit of the builder of the Temple at Jerusalem, when he exclaimed: "Heaven, and the Heaven of Heavens cannot contain thee; how much less this house that I have built!"

It remains for me to say that Henry was not less admirable as a man than as an orator, for his religious convictions were even profounder than his political, and he was irreproachably faithful, besides, to every obligation of civic, social, and domestic life.

We are told that when Henry descended from his carriage, at this county seat, for the purpose of engaging in his memorable discussion with John Randolph, he received so much popular homage that a Baptist minister exclaimed reproachfully, "Mr. Henry is not a god!" and that Henry replied in tones of the deepest humility, "No, no, indeed, my friend; I am but a poor worm of the dust, as fleeting and unsubstantial as the shadow of the cloud that flies over your fields and is remembered no more." This belief, however, it is needless to say, was not shared by his time, for, after his death, over his grave at Red Hill, his home in this county, were inscribed simply these words: "His fame is his best epitaph." Nor is it shared by our time, for now, some 136 years after his death, Congress has just taken the first step toward making Red Hill a national shrine, consecrated, like Mount Vernon, Monticello, and Stratford, to genius and patriotism.

The renown of John Randolph, of Roanoke, as a parliamentary and popular orator and talker, is also sustained by an imposing mass of contemporary testimony. In a letter to Monroe, Jefferson mentions Randolph's popular eloquence "as giving him such advantages as to place him, unrivaled, as the leader of the House of Representatives."

In one of his writings, John Adams, our second President, credited Randolph with "brilliant wit, fine imagination, and flowing eloquence." Testifying, after Randolph's death, in the litigation over his will, John C. Calhoun said: "Mr. Randolph was generally regarded as a man of remarkable genius and great brilliancy, with uncommon sagacity and keenness in debate, and distinguished colloquial powers." "Wit and genius all allowed him", we are told by Senator Thomas H. Benton, of Missouri, who served in the House of Representatives with him. "For more than 30 years", Benton further says, "he [Randolph] was the political meteor of Congress, blazing with undiminished splendor during the whole time." "I have listened", said Churchill C. Cambreling, of New York, in the House of Representatives, "with delight and instruction to some of our disinguished rivals for parliamentary fame, to the simple, but persuasive and fascinating reasoning of a Lowndes, to the melodious and impassioned eloquence of a Clay, to the lucid, commanding, and solid argument of a Webster, but, for a combination and profusion of all the weapons of parliamentary war, of wit, irony, sarcasm, imagination, and eloquence, he [Randolph] was surpassed by none. Nay, sir, as a parliamentary orator, he was unequaled. He combined all the skill of a debater, the genius of a poet, with the patriotism and sound philosophy of a statesman."

In the judgment of S. G. Goodrich, of Connecticut, better known to my early life under the pen name of Peter Parley, Randolph was undoubtedly a man of genius. Indeed, Goodrich says that, at times, Randolph "seems almost inspired." "There is no speaker in either House that excites such universal attention as Jack Randolph", that charming writer, Washington Irving, wrote to a correspondent, on one occasion. "His genius and oratorical powers, language, voice, and gesture, cause him to be listened to as, perhaps, no other man was ever listened to in Congress",

George R. Gilmer, who was in the House, at one time, with Randolph, writes of him in one of his letters. "He attracted a crowded gallery", says James Buchanan, who was also, at one time, in the House with him, "when it was known he would address the House, and always commanded the undivided attention of his whole audience." "When he began to speak", wrote Phoebe Morris, from Washington, to her father, at Philadelphia, "What a silence reigned throughout the House. Everyone appeared to wait in anxious, almost breathless, expectation, as if to catch the first sound of his voice." Still more significant were the words of Horace Binney, the celebrated advocate, at a memorial meeting, in honor of Randolph, held in Philadelphia, after his death. "He has probably spoken to more listeners than any other man of his day; having been unrivaled in the power of riveting the attention by the force and pungency of his language, the facility and beauty of his enunciation, and the point and emphasis of his most striking manner."

To the same effect is the language of Hugh Blair Grigsby, the well-known historical writer of this county: "It is unquestionably his praise that, above all his contemporaries, he was successful in fixing the attention of his audience of every class and degree throughout his longest speeches." Francis Walker Gilmer, of Virginia, who, to borrow a thought from Edgar Allan Poe, doubly died in that he died so young, after hearing Randolph in the House, ends a description of him in his Sketches with the remark: "Popular opinion has ordained Mr. Randolph the most eloquent speaker now in America." Samuel C. Jewett, of Maine, too, after hearing Randolph in the House, wrote to Gen. H. A. S. Dearborn, of Massachusetts, that Randolph was truly a man of astonishing powers of mind, and that his language was elegant beyond description. In his Memories of Fifty Years, W. H. Sparks depicts the speeches of Randolph in the House as "brilliant and beautiful." In his published recollections, Jacob Harvey said that he would never forget, while life remained, the delight with which he had listened to Randolph's most captivating eloquence. Referring to Randolph's gift for ridicule, Lemuel Sawyer, who served in the House of Representatives with him, says in his memoir: "With this powerful lever, he could shake, if not move, from its foundations, any administration." Well, indeed, might Henry Adams, when speaking of the shining part that Randolph played in the discussions of the Tenth Congress, say that "his every track was a flash of golden fire."

Hardly less profound was the impression made by Randolph upon his auditors, when he was a member of the Virginia Constitutional Convention of 1829–30. By Jeremiah Bell Jeter, the distinguished Baptist divine when, recalling the proceedings of that convention, we are told that John Randolph was "unquestionably the most perfect orator" to whom, in the course of half a century, it had been his privilege to listen. As to the influence, exerted by Randolph over that convention, Hugh R. Pleasants, the Richmond editor, testifies: "He was like the musical director in the midst of an immense orchestra; the players and the instruments seemed to obey the slightest motion of his hand." Nor should I forbear to add that the thrilling eloquence of Randolph, on the hustings, has also been attested in a very vivid way by men who heard him address audiences in his own congressional district. This testimony is largely contained in a series of remarkably well-written papers, assembled—to his lasting credit be it said—by Powhatan Bouldin, a native, I believe, of this county. In his recollections, William B. Green, of this county, mentions a speech delivered by Randolph, at this county seat, in 1833, in support of a series of resolutions drawn by him, which condemned the nullification proclamation of Andrew Jackson, and, commenting on this speech, says: "He spoke for a considerable time with overwhelming power and unsurpassed eloquence."

Still more intensive are the recollections of James W. Bouldin, of this county. Describing a speech that Randolph made at Prince Edward Courthouse, Bouldin says: "He spoke for an hour, perhaps, and when he concluded I found myself musing and walking without any aim or object; and, looking around, found the crowd gradually dispersing in the same mood. The Rev. Moses Hoge was sitting in a chair opposite the speaker, and remained till I observed him, still with his mouth open and looking steadfastly in the same direction. Parson Lyle was standing by him. Said Mr. Hoge to Lyle: 'I never heard the like before, and I never expect to hear the like again.'" The Rev. Mr. Hoge, we should remember, was, himself, one of the most eloquent orators that southside Virginia has ever known. As to the reputation for distinguished colloquial powers, which Calhoun assigns to Randolph, it is enough to say that Jared Sparks, of Massachusetts, the distinguished historical writer, records, in his journal, his belief that, if the conversation that he had had with Randolph in the course of a stage journey were printed, it would be "quite as entertaining, profound, and versatile" as Randolph's recent speeches in the United States Senate had been. To this we need but add the words of Senator Thomas H. Benton: "He was the charm of the dinner table, where his cheerful and sparkling wit delighted every ear, lit up every countenance, and detained every guest."

Not the least salient feature of the different personal recollections of Randolph, which have come down to us, is the distinctness with which they bring home to us Randolph's physical characteristics and manner in speaking. From all accounts there was something strange, not to say outré, in his general appearance. He was 6 feet 2 inches in height, and very thin. His lower limbs were disproportionately long for his body, and his head was disproportionately small for his body, and rested, or seemed to rest, upon his very shoulders. His hair was light and glossy and worn long. His face, though a beautiful one in his youth, was, even at 30 years of age, a young-old face, pallid in hue from chronic ill-health and suffering, seamed with wrinkles, and beardless. His teeth were as white as ivory. His eyes were hazel, of the darkest hue, and are said to have absolutely blazed when kindled by the excitement of debate. They and his voice were the truly redeeming attributes of his physique. Apparently, few voices, even on the operatic stage, have ever been more admired than was his. Hugh Blair Grigsby terms it "a rich soprano" and says that during the sessions of the Virginia Constitutional Convention of 1829–30 its thrilling music fell upon the ear of that assembly like the notes of a bird singing in the pause of the storm. One of Randolph's auditors informs us that its inflections were so sweet and its emphasis so proper and varied, that there was a positive pleasure in hearing him speak any words whatsoever. Another says that Randolph's voice was as clear as the tones of a silver bell; another that it was as soft, as rich, and as delicious as the most mellifluous tones of Jenny Lind when she poured her whole soul into one of her breathing melodies.

In speaking, Randolph's manner was highly dignified, graceful, and commanding. He gesticulated but little, except with his long, bony, sarcastic forefinger, and his enunciation was so deliberate that it seemed as if he almost heeded points of punctuation as he spoke. The truth is, perhaps, that Hugh Blair Grigsby was not far wrong when he said that John Randolph was a consummate actor, and, in the philosophy of voice and gesture and in his pauses, as perfect an adept as ever trod the boards of a stage.

Of Randolph's infirmities, this is no time to speak. They were all referable to a high-strung temperament, unceasing ill-health, and a mental balance that more than once lost its poise. Suffice it to say that he was scrupulously honorable and upright in his private conduct, and, in public conduct, was actuated by as lofty motives as have ever shaped the political career of any native of Virginia—that State which Jefferson once termed "the good Old Dominion, the blessed Mother of us all", and the New England poet, James Russell Lowell, later termed "the Mother of States and unpolluted men." If he was more susceptible than most men are to the impulses of human resentment and animosity, we should not forget that he was more susceptible than most men are to the tenderest impulses of love and pity.

Last year that accomplished scholar, Dr. Fitzgerald Flournoy, of Washington and Lee University, in a letter to me, spoke of the woods of Charlotte County as "immortal woods." Such they were, and are, and ever will be, in the eyes of every true son or daughter of this county. As for myself, I need say only that on the Staunton Hill plantation, in this county, where I was born, there is a hill called Hunt's Hill, and that it has always been imperishably impressed upon my memory because unquestionably authentic testimony establishes the fact that this hill, uninhabitated and lonely as it is now, has been honored by the footsteps of both Patrick Henry and John Randolph, of Roanoke, two men of genius, if two men of genius there ever were.

Some time ago the happy thought occurred to my son David, who is, I am glad to say, fully alive to the noble traditions of this county, that the gift of a portrait of each of the great orators to whom I have been referring, to the people of this county, might be an acceptable one to them; and now that they have assured him that it would be, I present, on his behalf, to them, the two portraits which are to serve his purpose; believing, as I do so, that they will always, from generation to generation, be cherished by the local pride and patriotic instincts of this county.

THE PRESIDENT'S JACKSON DAY DINNER ADDRESS

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the text of the address delivered by the President of the United States on the occasion of the Jackson Day dinner in Washington, D. C., January 8 last.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, my friends, on our dinner card tonight is a medallion portrait of a man who gave a memorable toast: "The Federal Union—it must be preserved!"

This meeting tonight, in the city of Washington, is one of many hundreds being held throughout our 48 States and Territorial possessions, and even on board ships at sea, in honor of the memory of a great general and President, Andrew Jackson. To all of you I extend my most sincere and heartfelt greetings.

I am happy to stand here tonight and declare to you that the real issue before the United States is the right of the average man and woman to lead a finer, a better, and a happier life. That was the same issue, more than 100 years ago, that confronted Andrew Jackson.

I speak tonight to this Democratic meeting—and to those Democratic meetings throughout the Nation—in the same language as if I were addressing a Republican gathering, a Progressive gathering, an Independent gathering, a Farmer-Labor gathering, a gathering of businessmen, or a gathering of workers or farmers. There is nothing that I say here tonight that does not apply to every citizen in the country no matter what his or her political affiliations may be.

It is true that we Americans have found party organizations to be useful, and indeed necessary, in the crystallization of opinion and in the demarcation of issues. It is true that I have received many honors at the hands of one of our great parties. It is nevertheless true that in the grave questions that confront the United States today I, as President of the United States, must and will consider our common problems first, foremost, and preeminently from the American point of view.

To most of us Andrew Jackson appropriately has become the symbol of certain great ideals. I like best to think of him as a man whom the average American deeply and fundamentally understood. To the masses of his countrymen his purposes and his character were an open book. They loved him well because they understood him well—his passion for justice, his championship of the cause of the exploited and the downtrodden, his ardent and flaming patriotism.

Jackson sought social justice and fought for human rights in his many battles to protect the people against autocratic or oligarchic aggression.

If at times his passionate devotion to this cause of the average citizen lent an amazing zeal to his thoughts, his speech, and his actions, the people loved him for it the more. They realized the intensity of the attacks by his enemies, by those who, thrust from power and position, pursued him with relentless hatred. The beneficiaries of the abuses to which he put an end pursued him with all the violence that political passions can generate. But the people of his day were not deceived. They loved him for the enemies he had made.

Backed not only by his party but by thousands who had belonged to other parties, or belonged to no party at all, Andrew Jackson was compelled to fight every inch for the ideals and policies of the democratic Republic in which he believed. An overwhelming proportion of the material power of the country was arrayed against him. The great media for the dissemination of information and the molding of public opinion fought him. Haughty and sterile intellectualism opposed him. Musty reaction disapproved him. Hollow and outworn traditionalism shook a trembling finger at him. It seemed that sometimes all were against him—all but the people of the United States.

Because history so often repeats itself, let me analyze further. Andrew Jackson stands out in the century and a half of our independent history not merely because he was two-fisted and fought for the people's rights but because, through his career, he did as much as any man in our history to increase, on the part of the voters, knowledge of public problems and interest in their solution. Following the fundamentals of Jefferson he adhered to the broad philosophy that decisions made by the average of the voters would be more greatly enduring for, and helpful to, the Nation than decisions made by small segments of the electorate representing small or special classes endowed with great advantages of social or economic power.

He, like Jefferson, faced with the grave difficulty of disseminating facts to the electorate as a whole, was compelled to combat epithets, generalities, misrepresentation, and the suppression of facts by the process of asking his supporters, and indeed all citizens, to constitute themselves into informal committees for the purpose of obtaining the facts and of spreading them abroad among their friends, their associates, and their fellow workers.

I am aware that some wise-cracking columnist will probably say that good old Jackson no doubt realized that every red-blooded American citizen considered himself a committee of one anyway. Nevertheless, Jackson got his ideas and his ideals across, not through any luxurious propaganda but because the man on the street and the man on the farm believed in his ideas, his ideals, and his honesty; went out and dug up the facts and spread them abroad throughout the land.

History repeats—I am becoming dimly conscious of the fact that this year we are to have a national election. Sometimes at the close of a day I say to myself that the last national election must have been held a dozen years ago—so much water has run under the bridge, so many great events in our history have occurred since then. And yet but 34 months, less than 3 years, have gone by since March 1933.

History repeats—in these crowded months, as in the days of Jackson, two great achievements stand forth—the rebirth of the interest and understanding of a great citizenry in the problems of the Nation and an established Government which by positive action has proved its devotion to the recovery and well-being of that citizenry.

Whatever may be the platform, whoever may be the nominee of the Democratic Party—and I am told by the chairman that a convention is to be held to decide these momentous questions—the basic issue will be the retention of popular government, an issue fraught once more with the difficult problem of disseminating facts and yet more facts in the face of an opposition bent on hiding and distorting facts.

That is why organization—not party organization alone, important as that is, but organization among all those, regardless of party, who believe in retaining progress and ideals—is so essential.

That is why, in addition to organization, I make this specific recommendation—that each and every one of you who are interested in obtaining the facts and in spreading those facts abroad, each and every one of you interested in getting at the truth that lies somewhere behind the smokescreen of charges and countercharges of a national campaign, constitute yourself a committee of one. To do this you need no parchment certificate; to do this you need no title. To do this you need only your own conviction, your own intelligence, and your own belief in the highest duty of the American citizen.

To act as such a committee of one will need only your own appointment, an appointment which carries with it some effort, some obligation on your part to carry out the task you have assigned to yourself. You will have to run down statements made to you by others which you may believe to be false. You will need to analyze the motives of those who make assertions to you, to make an inventory in your own community, in order that you may check and recheck for yourself and thereby be in a position to answer those who have been misled or those who would mislead.

After my annual message to the Congress last Friday evening I received many appreciative letters and telegrams from all over the country, and I think it will interest you to know that within a few hours I received more of these than at any time since the critical days of the spring of 1933. I have carefully read those letters and telegrams and found two facts which are worthy of repeating to you tonight. The first is that a very large number were sent to me by families who evidently heard my message while grouped together in the family home. "My wife and I want you to know how much we appreciate", and so forth, or "the Jones family, gathered tonight with our friends, sends you this message of confidence." In other words, as greatly and perhaps even more greatly than on any other occasion since I have been in the White House, I have the definite feeling that what I have said about the great problems that face us as a Nation received a responsive, an appreciative, and an understanding answer in the homes of America. And I need not tell you that this means a lot to me.

The other interesting fact about these letters and telegrams is the very great number of them that come from businessmen, storekeepers, bankers, and manufacturers. The gist of their messages to me is that they appreciate and are grateful for my statement that it is but a minority in business and finance that would "gang up" against the people's liberties. I reiterate that assertion tonight. By far the greater part of the businessmen, industrialists, and other employers of the Nation seek no special advantage; they seek only an equal opportunity to share in the common benefits, the common responsibilities, and the common obligations of government.

I am naturally grateful for this support and for the understanding on their part that the Government of the United States seeks to give them a square deal and a better deal—seeks to protect them and to save them from being plowed under by the small minority of businessmen and financiers, against whom I shall continue to wage war.

We can be thankful that men and women in all walks of life realize more and more that government is a living force in their lives. They understand that the value of their Government depends on the interest which they display in it and the knowledge they have of its policies.

A government can be no better than the public opinion that sustains it.

I know you will not be surprised by lack of comment on my part tonight on the recent decision by the Supreme Court 2 days ago. I cannot and will not render offhand judgment without studying, with the utmost care, two of the most momentous opinions—the majority opinion and the minority opinion—ever rendered in any case before the Supreme Court of the United States. The ultimate results of the language of these opinions will profoundly affect the lives of Americans for years to come. It is enough to say that the attainment of justice and the continuance of prosperity for American agriculture remains an immediate and constant objective of my administration.

Just as Jackson roused the people to their fundamental duties as citizens, so must the leadership of this era do its utmost to encourage and sustain widespread interest in public affairs. There was something of the eternal youth in the spirit of Jackson. The destiny of youth became the destiny of America.

Tasks immediately before us are as arduous as the conquest of the frontier a century ago. The Nation is still young, still growing, still conscious of its high destiny. Enthusiasm and the intelligence of the youth of the land are necessary to the fulfillment of that destiny.

As I understand the temper of the people, particularly the temper of youth, no party of reaction, no candidates of reaction can fulfill the hope and faith of that everlasting spirit. It is the sacred duty of us who are vested with the responsibility of leadership to justify the expectations of the young men and women of the United States.

We are at peace with the world; but the fight goes on. Our frontiers of today are economic, not geographic. Our enemies of today are the forces of privilege and greed within our own borders.

And so I say to all of you, may a double portion of Old Hickory's heroic spirit be upon us tonight. May we be inspired by the power and the glory and the justice of his rugged and fearless life.

The people of America know the heart and the purpose of their Government.

They and we will not retreat.

MAINTENANCE OF PEACE—"LET'S HOLD FAST TO AMERICA"

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, in reference to Senate bill 3474, permit me to say that the most important issue before the American public today and in the days that are to come is the maintenance of peace. Confronted as we are by the pressure of many unsolved political and economic problems within our own borders we cannot afford to be plunged into the maelstrom of war. I shall favor every practical measure which will keep us in the paths of honorable peace, at home and abroad.

With the lessons of the World War still fresh in our minds, with unpaid war debts speaking to us every time we consider the financial ills of our Nation, and with ominous war clouds threatening the peace of the world, let us take every known precaution to establish our will to peace in the eyes of every nation before it is too late.

During our national history we have become embroiled in but two foreign wars. We were led into the War of 1812 and the World War of 1914 because our rights on the high seas were jeopardized. If we are to escape war in the future, we must make provision for our maritime relationships so that they will not again implicate us in strife.

We must be careful lest our sincere desire for peace leads to our betrayal into war as was the case 20 years ago. We must beware lest the pressure of organized peace propaganda thrust us into such a conspicuous position that we become an object of attack simply because we have spoken too fast and too soon. How many of us would care to see our country thus made the moral scapegoat for the rest of the world?

In this connection I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the observations of Walter Pitkin in the January issue of the Farm Journal, of which he is editor. His editorial bears the title: "Let's Hold Fast to America."

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Farm Journal, January 1936]

Watch your step! One slip and you may be wiped out!

The power lunatics of the Old World prepare for bigger and better mass murder. We must keep out of the range of their guns. We must not cheer either side, lest the other side turn upon us. We must close our ears to the seemingly innocent bystander who tells us of the merits of some great gang.

Our only safety lies in absolute neutrality and aloofness, no matter what its price. (And the price will be heavy enough, no doubt, though not one one-hundredth so heavy as the price of war.) One more world war and we shall be ruined. We have thus far lost $55,000,000,000 on the last World War and gained nothing in return. (Is any sucker still fooled by any of the silly claims that we did gain something?)

Luckily, most older Americans are thoroughly disillusioned about war. What the American Legion men think about France, Germany, Italy, Belgium, Rumania, and other nations cannot be printed on a polite page. Whether they are right or not is beside the point. They will join up with the wildest pacifists in keeping us out of war.

But alas, we now have millions of younger citizens (many of them voters) who know the years 1914–18 only through story books and the tales told by veterans around the card tables. These millions haven't a glimmering of what is going on behind the scenes in the Old World, and youth never learns from age—only by its own hard bumps.

Three war gangs scheme to wreck the older and larger nations of the Old World and to seize choice parcels of their territories. By all odds the most powerful and most ruthless gang just now is that led by the Japanese generals and admirals, who put Dillinger to blush. They have just seized another vast tract of North China, using the mask of a comic puppet kingdom, which fools nobody. Just as fast as they think it safe to snatch more land from China, Russia, or Great Britain, they will snatch it. In fact, they admit it in ingeniously veiled phrases.

Tokio gangsters know that the Russians must have another 5 years' peace to push their stupendous job of creating an industrial state out of a medieval barbarism. They also know that the British will have a hard time holding their own against Italy in the Mediterranean. So the Japanese grow bolder with each passing day.

Were Mussolini to carry out his threat with his death squadron, and were these 125 fliers to be even half successful in their openly avowed plan to fly their bombing planes straight into British battleships and cruisers, blowing up themselves and their targets with superbombs, the British Navy would, in a single day, sink to the level of a third-class power—and the Japanese fleet would steam into Hong Kong within 30 days thereafter. The power of the British in the Far East would pass.

Would Russia move against Japan in that event? No. For it knows that Hitler publicly declares his intention to seize part of Russia as soon as he finishes his present program of arms and ammunition. So the plot of the great gangs is very simple: Italy and Japan will take the British for a ride, while Germany mops up Russia. A fair division of thuggery and a fair division of loot after the smoke clears away!

No wonder that some of the most powerful newspapers in England are now saying that England's only hope is not the League of Nations but rather an alliance with the United States. So declared Lord Beaverbrook just before Thanksgiving Day in an impassioned speech before the assembled trade-union leaders of Great Britain. We shall hear much more such talk before long. Make no mistake about that.

And what shall we say to those who suggest any alliance whatever? Simply this:

"Gentlemen! In every way everybody loses and nobody gains in the long run. We would rather lose all of our business with the great gangs than to side with any of them or against them all. Loss of foreign trade is petty beside the losses of any war, even a fourth-class one.

"If you start another European war or a Far Eastern war, we promise you complete and final ruin.

"We further promise you a brisk, bloody, and complete overthrow of your vaunted institutions by an impoverished and outraged mob of ex-soldiers, war widows, ruined businessmen, and idle workers. The victims of your imbecile war will outnumber those of you who retain influence and wealth. They will dispossess you of both and rightly, too, for you will have proved yourselves unfit to rule. No, thanks. We'll stay home and take care of ourselves, no matter what happens abroad."

A few weeks ago Mussolini sent to all Italian newspapers published in the United States a stern set of rules as to what they should and should not print; and how they should play up certain high lights about Italian activities in Africa.

A few Italian editors who happened to be more American than Fascist disclosed this censorship from Rome. We may expect similar disclosures in the future from other sources.

We are the richest nation on earth still, in spite of all our hard luck. We are also the most secure. Of course, every great gang wants us either on its side or else entirely out of the gun play. Of course, we must endure a withering barrage of propaganda during 1936. Let's be prepared in advance.

"Millions for defense, but not one cent for gangsters!"

SUPREME COURT DECISION IN A. A. A. CASE

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial from the Philadelphia Inquirer, under date of January 8, entitled "Still the Land of the Free."

The editorial comments on the opinion of the Supreme Court in the Agricultural Adjustment Administration case; and inasmuch as reference is made to one of the attorneys in the case who not so many years ago was a distinguished Member of this body, I am confident none of his former colleagues would interpose an objection.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STILL THE LAND OF THE FREE

Wreckage of the invalidated Agricultural Adjustment Act today lies beside the ruins of the outlawed N. R. A. Thus fall, at a word from the Supreme Court of the United States, those regimented monstrosities which President Roosevelt, in October 1933 proudly acclaimed as the "pillars" of the New Deal. From the debris rises plain, old-fashioned Americanism.

The Court's 6-to-3 verdict against the A. A. A., amendments and all, is the best news this country has had since that epochal day last May when the Blue Eagle bit the dust. Affecting directly, perhaps, more persons than has any other decision by a Supreme Court in the history of the Nation, it shines forth as unqualified assurance that it is the Federal Constitution, and not that weird jumble which the President has termed "new instruments of public power", that still guides the Nation's destinies.

The majority opinion of the Court, as read by Justice Roberts, leaves no shadow of doubt concerning the fundamental illegality of the farm act. Congress has no constitutional power to enforce its commands upon the farmer to the ends sought by the law. It has no power to tax and spend to obtain compliance. It has no legal authority to regulate agriculture within the States. It should be noted that the majority of the Court holds that even were farm cooperation wholly voluntary, instead of being in part compulsory, the act would still be invalid.

Moreover, the majority clarifies to a degree the extent to which the "general welfare" clauses of the Constitution may be made the basis for specific legislation. In the interpretation of the Court majority, "general welfare" does not authorize the use of tax funds for any particular group. The clause means what it implies—taxing and spending for general, not special, welfare.

What this sweeping decision against A. A. A. may indicate concerning the fate of other controverted legislation of the New Deal it may be idle to speculate. Yet there can be little question that inherent in the Guffey coal-control law, the Bankhead Cotton Act, and the notorious hot-potato law, are the same regulatory philosophy and the same invasion of the rights of States which marked the foredoomed A. A. A. Nor are the Wagner Labor Act and the Wheeler-Rayburn utility law armored against some of the same accusations of invalidity which found A. A. A. vulnerable. It is significant that the majority decision declares that if the A. A. A.'s taxes were valid, all industry could be dominated by Congress through the same means.

With the grotesque farm program reduced to unspeakable chaos, there remains doubt as to what the Roosevelt administration, which has paid more than $1,000,000,000 to farmers for not producing crops and livestock, will contrive to offset this extreme blow to its prestige, its economic policies, and its Presidential election campaign strategy. Hundreds of millions of dollars in processing taxes are left, by the decision, hanging in the air. Crop-curtailment contracts which call for payment of other hundreds of millions remain to be adjusted. Whatever the administration does to clear up this ghastly mess, it is plain that it must act within constitutional limits.

What now have the great planners, the Wallaces, the Tugwells, and all the rest of the goose-step crew to say for a policy which, in order to raise prices to the farmer, promulgated a reign of scarcity in a land that demands abundance? What of the 6,000,000 little pigs that became a sacrificial symbol of a Federal administration which set itself above natural law and sane economics? And what, it may reasonably be asked, is the status of President Roosevelt, who declared that A. A. A., no longer on an emergency basis, was to be a permanent institution?

The planners, the professors, the "brain twisters", and the President have suffered set-backs before in their career of making America over. But never have they been faced with such a gigantic, overwhelming failure, such a stupendous blunder as their fantastic A. A. A. Whence now will come the "gentle rain" of corn-hog checks which have kept the rural fields fertile for that joyous sower of partisan political seed, James A. Farley?

The Nation's millions of consumers have cause to give thanks that the artificial price kiting of the processing taxes has been eliminated. The market basket scores a victory at last. But by the same token there is no reason to believe that prices to the farmer will collapse in the wake of the A. A. A. decision. Rather, it would appear more likely that prices, freed from restraint, as in the historic case of the N. I. R. A., will go forward—and that without the inequitable rise in general living costs induced by the processing taxes. With the present industrial upswing dating from the overthrow of N. I. R. A., it is improbable that the extinction of A. A. A. can have anything but a beneficial effect on farm prosperity.

To a distinguished leader of the Philadelphia bar, George Wharton Pepper, should go a measure of the Nation's gratitude for A. A. A.'s death sentence. Nor will that day be forgotten, when, pleading the cause of America and the American people against the Roosevelt Regimenters of A. A. A. before the Supreme Court, former Senator Pepper cried: "I pray Almighty God that not in my time may the land of the regimented be accepted as a worthy substitute for the land of the free."

Thanks to the Supreme Court, America is still the land of the free.

RECORD OF THE NEW DEAL—ADDRESS BY GOVERNOR LEHMAN

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, last evening the able Governor of my State made a notable speech at the Jackson Day dinner in New York City. I ask unanimous consent that the address may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of Thursday, Jan. 9, 1936]

GOVERNOR LEHMAN'S ADDRESS TO DEMOCRATS ON NATION'S RECOVERY UNDER THE NEW DEAL

I am not here tonight to make a political speech. I would not invoke oratory even if I had the power to do so. I do not intend to appeal to emotions, passions, or partisanship. I come here as a former businessman for the purpose of laying before you a few simple facts with regard to the recent economic crisis in this country and our recovery from it. They are facts which too many of us are apt to take for granted; facts that have been discolored or submerged by a lot of political dispute, charge, and countercharge.

The years since the fall of 1929 will long stand out as a period of unusually acute world depression, in which the very souls of men were tried and in which the test of leadership was accomplishment toward social and economic recovery. Heavy as the responsibilities have been, it has been my great privilege to serve our State and its people during this critical period. I have had the opportunity of observing closely and at first hand the ever-changing scene and of playing some small part in stemming the relentless flood of disaster and in toiling for the recovery which happily has now come to us.

None of us will readily forget the situation in this country at the beginning of 1933. I recall only too vividly the nightmare of those gripping and heart-rending weeks. I recall the ever-increasing stream of men who sought, almost without hope, help and encouragement and leadership. Many of these men had for years been great leaders in industry, in commerce, in finance, and in the professions.

CRY FOR LEADERSHIP IN 1933 IS RECALLED

In those trying days of 1933 they were not rugged individualists; they were just a lot of tired and bewildered men. And well may there have been fear and panic and distrust. Men knew not where to turn or on whom to lean.

No one was wise enough to plan with confidence for the future; no one knew from day to day whether the economic and social fabric of our Nation would hold. The very future of our Nation was in the balance, and it was evident that we would safely emerge from the crisis only if leadership was wise and courageous and action vigorous and sound.

We cannot forget the critical plight of the banks at the beginning of 1933. Efforts were made by Government as well as by public-spirited individuals to protect the savings of millions of bank depositors and to safeguard the fruits of a lifetime of labor.

Unfortunately, hysteria and fright, together with lack of liquidity in many institutions, had placed upon the banking facilities of the country a burden so great that it could no longer be carried. Because of distrust and panic, people all over the country wanted their money, and even the soundest banks were unable to convert their assets into cash sufficiently rapidly to care for the insistent demands.

We have not forgotten the situation of our great life-insurance companies, endangered by the ever-increasing demands of policyholders for loans or surrender value of their policies.

Because I came in contact with so much of their suffering I remember vividly the thousands upon thousands of people out of employment and in need, who could not possibly be taken care of adequately through the resources of State and municipalities alone.

You and I recall the position of manufacturers and merchants whose business had fallen off so rapidly and so greatly that they were forced either to shut down or substantially to reduce their working forces. It takes no effort of memory to picture the unhappy financial status of even our strongest companies in 1932 and 1933. Corporation after corporation, firm after firm, showed deficits instead of the usual profits.

We remember the difficulties of the railroad companies in avoiding insolvency. At that time it looked as if the entire railroad system of the country inevitably would rapidly move into receivership.

Throughout the country home owners and property owners in larger and larger numbers were being foreclosed and dispossessed. The situation of agriculture was desperate. Prices were so low that the farmer could not get back even the money he had put into his production of commodities.

BANKRUPTCY WAS NEAR FOR MUNICIPALITIES

It is a matter of public record that the municipalities of this country, including New York City and many of the other large cities, were deeply embarrassed. They were powerless to finance even their current needs. Inability of property owners to meet their real-estate tax obligations and the unwillingness of financial institutions to extend further credit were rapidly bringing about municipal bankruptcy on a large scale. Had the threatened default of New York City become an actuality it would have rocked the entire municipal credit structure of this country.

That, in brief, was the situation in the spring of 1933. I have not overdrawn the picture. No honest person can deny the existence of a gripping fear and panic—indeed of almost complete economic paralysis. The country was sick well-nigh unto death, and our people were without hope. Old leadership was impotent.

If we were to survive, if we were to recover, it was necessary to replace distrust, suspicion, fear, and panic with a spirit of hopefulness and a deep determination to fight on. New leadership was needed—a leadership that would rally the fighting qualities of the American people—a leadership that would translate supine theorizing into vigorous and courageous action. That was the situation on March 4, 1933, when into the office of President of the United States stepped Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Three years have passed since March 1933. Much has happened. We talk glibly of regimentation, of constitutional safeguards, of rugged individualism. These terms mean many things to many people. In themselves they are mere catch phrases, slogans to be gloated over and to be used for political purposes. Clearly, the only real test in any undertaking is that of accomplishment.

CONSTITUTION HELD SACRED BY DEMOCRATS

No responsible public official wishes deliberately to impose unnecessary limitations or rules upon people and upon the freedom of their individual activities. The Constitution is as sacred to Democrats as to Republicans. Every public official, National, State, and municipal, desires, I am sure, so far as the circumstances permit, to have a balanced Budget.

I can testify from my own experience that the leaders of government worry their hearts out day and night with the problems of unemployment relief. What a great world it would be if we were only wise enough to find the answer to the problem of putting back at work more than 10,000,000 unemployed in the face of depleted purchasing power and the mounting tide of labor-saving machinery and tools!

But until we do, every public official, no matter what his political faith, can do no less than provide food and shelter to the needy unemployed. Who would dare do otherwise?

No thinking person could have expected that there would be no mistakes made in the fight against depression. No sincere person can claim that there have been no mistakes. Of course, there have been mistakes made, both in the Nation and in the State—I would not be honest if I claimed otherwise.

Emergencies call for action; and until our foresight is as good as our hindsight, only those men who are unwilling to act with decision and promptness can possibly hope to avoid mistakes. But, regardless of whether one is in agreement with every act and every policy, the fact is clear that progress—real progress—has been made all along the line. The record speaks for itself.

Our financial institutions, our savings banks, commercial banks, and trust companies were reopened as promptly after the Fourth of March as it was possible. Today they are happily stronger than ever. Their rapid recovery was not a matter of chance. It came after careful planning and the fullest cooperation of Federal and State Governments.

Their position has continuously improved because of careful and wise supervision, partial guaranty of deposits, increased liquidity, and very greatly enhanced security and investment values. As a result of the increased strength and the renewed confidence that people have in our financial institutions, deposits have grown each year since 1933.

Although large numbers are still unemployed and the relief rolls are large, the deposits in mutual savings banks throughout the Nation had reached a total on July 1, 1935, of nearly $10,000,000,000, which is within 2 percent of the all-time high-peak record. The number of individual savings-bank accounts on July 1 was the largest in banking history, being nearly 14,000,000. That is certainly an indication of renewed confidence and prosperity.

INSURANCE COMPANIES A HEALTHY BAROMETER

Our insurance companies, guardians of the savings and protectors of the destinies of many millions of families throughout the country, are today as strong as ever in their history. Again their recovery was not just a matter of chance. It came through wise legislation, sound governmental supervision and the great advance that has taken place not only in securities but in the value of mortgages on farms, homes, and business properties.

The volume of business transacted by insurance companies is recording a healthy, steady growth. Could there be a better evidence of the thrift and restored confidence of the American people?

Whereas, in 1932 and the early part of 1933, manufacturers and merchants were facing actual deficits and in many cases threatened with bankruptcy, today they are in the main making money, and the outlook is promising.

I quote from an article from Thomas J. Watson, president of one of our largest corporations:

"Industrial activity stands at 80 percent as compared with 1929. Pig-iron production, which is a basic industry, was more than one-fourth greater in 11 months of 1935 than in the comparable period of 1934. It was one and one-half times the corresponding output of 1933 and was more than two and a quarter times that of 1932.

"These industrial gains have been reflected in corporation earnings and prices of shares. Net earnings of industrial corporations in 9 months of 1935 were 29 percent above 1934, and 54 percent above 1933, for corresponding periods. During the past 3 years we have had an increase in corporate share values of 97 percent, and during the year 1935 share values increased 32 percent."

And here are a few more figures: Electrical-power consumption increased almost 10 percent over last year, and it is now at its all-time high. Wool consumption increased 84 percent. It, too, is at an all-time high. Automobile production increased 35 percent. I am advised that production and sales of automobiles throughout the year 1935 not only surpassed all depression years but in many instances eclipsed former records of 1928 and 1929.

INCREASES RECITED IN INDUSTRIAL OUTPUT

Crude-oil production increased 9 percent. It is now at the highest point since 1929. The production of shoes increased 6 percent over 1934, and the production is today at the highest for all time. Copper production increased 20 percent. It is now at its highest point since 1931.

From the steel industry comes the report that the production of ingots for November 1935 was virtually twice as great as in November 1934. Total pay rolls were almost 50 percent higher than those paid in November 1934.

Construction contracts in 37 Eastern States in November 1935 were $180,000,000 as compared to $111,000,000 in 1934. Our railroad companies, for the first time in many years, are showing profits instead of deficits. Reports by 74 railroads show net earnings in November of $51,000,000, as compared to $32,000,000 for the same month of 1934. Carloadings in that month were the highest since 1931.

In summary, I would like to cite a few index figures taken from reliable business-activity indices. I shall compare March 1933 and November 1935.

New York Times business index rose from 63 in March 1933 to 96 in November 1935.

The Annalist index of business activity from 58 to 90.

Guaranty Survey index of business activity from 53 to 80.

Every one of these indices shows at least a 50-percent increase in business activity since March of 1933.

AGRICULTURE'S STATUS IS GREATLY IMPROVED

Likewise the position of agriculture has completely changed since 1932. Farm-cash income for October, the peak month for cash-crop marketing, is placed at $851,000,000, the highest monthly income since 1929. This is 22 percent above October 1934 and 102 percent over the same month in 1932.

It is estimated that total cash income for 1935 will reach nearly $7,000,000,000, compared with $6,383,000,000 last year, $5,117,000,000 in 1933, and low-water mark of $3,987,000,000 in the 12 months ended April 1933. In other words, from this 1933 figure there has been an increase of nearly $3,000,000,000 of farm income.

The record shows that there was not a single failure on the New York Stock Exchange during the entire year 1935. The market average of listed securities is 30 percent higher than a year ago. The value of securities listed on the New York Stock Exchange increased $2,000,000,000 in the month of December alone.

It is an interesting and significant fact that while American Government and corporation bonds sold on an average 2 points higher than in 1934, the average price of foreign bonds was 7 points lower than a year ago.

In 1933 the municipalities, including those of the highest credit standing, were frequently unable to borrow money, even at 6 percent. In September 1933 the credit of the city of New York was substantially restored under the so-called bankers agreement. This brought about such renewed confidence in municipal financing that the credit of all the municipalities of the country has been vastly and permanently strengthened. Today municipal credit is good. Today municipal securities have regained their original values.

The pages of every newspaper and of every trade journal show improvement both in actual conditions and in sentiment for the future. No one who lived through 1932 and the first half of 1933 can possibly doubt that the situation today is entirely different from what it was in those terrible days.

Confidence, hope, and vigorous optimism have replaced fear and panic. Relatively satisfactory earnings have taken the place of huge deficits. Dividends from business are increasing. Our banks, our insurance companies are solvent and making money.

Many railroad companies are out of the red for the first time in years. Merchants, manufacturers, service industries are doing well. The situation today is just as different from what it was in 1932 and the early part of 1933 as day is from night.

I promised you at the beginning of my remarks that I would confine myself to a careful submission of facts. The figures I have given speak for themselves forcefully and in unmistakable terms. They need no advocate or special pleading or explanation. They are unanswerable because they constitute a record of outstanding accomplishment toward recovery and prosperity.

May I say that these are times not for recrimination but for understanding, not for exaggerated statements but for sober, detached judgments, not of fear and concern but of confidence and courage.

The interests of the people of America are common. They are interdependent. With mutual understanding of the rights and interests of other groups, we should courageously and unitedly pursue the road of recovery to the point where the great numbers of American people may enjoy a high level of economic security, both during their working years and during their old age.

DECISION OF SUPREME COURT ON A. A. A. LAW

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the decision by the Supreme Court in the Hoosac Mills case, holding that the processing tax levied in the Agricultural Adjustment Act is not enforceable on the ground that the proceeds from the tax are to be used for local agricultural purposes, sets up a judicial landmark which will stand out in the history of this country in the progressive efforts of the Supreme Court to establish in that Court power to supervise the action of the other two coordinate branches of the Government.

The Court stated in the majority opinion:

We approach its decision [the constitutionality of the act] with a sense of grave responsibility to render judgment in accordance with the principles established for the governance of all three branches of the Government.

The responsibility involved was one of asserting power in the Court to investigate and annul the exercise of the power which the other two branches of the Government believed they had the power under the Constitution to exercise.

The economic philosophy of the act involved is one which has caused widespread controversy between differing groups of economic philosophy. It seems that while there are very definite views on the wisdom of the act pro and con, the opinion of the majority of the court clearly indicates that a majority of the judges have very definite views on the wisdom of the act. Current newspaper reports state that the judge who delivered the opinion manifested emotion and pathos in his pronouncements of the reasons for destroying the essential features of the act. The opinion engages in a discussion of what the Court regards as many absurd things that Congress might hereafter do if the Supreme Court does not halt it in this case.

Many of the arguments sound very much like what would be expected from a legislator speaking in an effort to convince his political colleagues that the act under consideration was unwise and set a bad precedent.

The majority opinion held that Congress had the power to tax and to appropriate under what is commonly called the welfare clause. I quote from the opinion:

Since the foundation of the Nation sharp differences of opinion have persisted as to the true interpretation of the phrase. Madison asserted it amounted to no more than a reference to the other powers enumerated in the subsequent clauses of the same section; that, as the United States is a government of limited and enumerated powers, the grant of power to tax and spend for the general national welfare must be confined to the enumerated legislative fields committed to Congress. In this view the phrase is mere tautology, for taxation and appropriation are, or may be, necessary incidents of the exercise of any of the enumerated legislative powers. Hamilton, on the other hand, maintained the clause confers a power separate and distinct from those later enumerated, is not restricted in meaning by the grant of them, and Congress consequently has a substantive power to tax and to appropriate, limited only by the requirement that it shall be exercised to provide for the general welfare of the United States. Each contention has the support of those whose views are entitled to weight. This Court has noticed the question but has never found it necessary to decide which is the true construction. Mr. Justice Story, in his commentaries, espouses the Hamiltonian position. We shall not review the writings of public men and commentators or discuss the legislative practice. Study of all of these leads us to conclude that the reading advocated by Mr. Justice Story is the correct one. While, therefore, the power to tax is not unlimited, its confines are set in the clause which confers it, and not in those of section 8, which bestow and define the legislative powers of the Congress. It results that the power of Congress to authorize expenditure of public moneys for public purposes is not limited by the direct grants of legislative power found in the Constitution.

At a later place in the opinion the Court said:

We are not now required to ascertain the scope of the phrase "general welfare of the United States" or to determine whether an appropriation in aid of agriculture falls within it. Wholly apart from that question another principle embedded in our Constitution prohibits the enforcement of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. The act invades the reserved rights of the States. It is a statutory plan to "regulate and control" agricultural production, a matter beyond the powers delegated to the Federal Government. The tax, the appropriation of the funds raised, and the direction for their disbursement are but parts of the plan. They are but means to an unconstitutional end.

The Court, after approving Hamilton's and Story's views on a proper construction of the welfare clause, points out that Story makes it clear that the powers of taxation and appropriation extend only to matters of national as distinguished from local welfare. As a necessary prerequisite for annulling the power of Congress to tax and appropriate for the welfare of agriculture, the Court finds that agriculture is a local rather than a national interest; and therefore, even with power in Congress to tax and appropriate for the general welfare without limitation of subjects, it cannot be done under the Constitution for agriculture on account of another section in the Constitution which reserves to the States or the people powers not granted in the Federal Constitution.

It is a most remarkable and astounding conclusion of fact by the Court that agriculture in this country is solely a local affair—just millions of farm units—and that aggregate crops, constituting a great stream of interstate and foreign commerce, always remain separate units from separate farms, local in their existence, and that no national interest is involved. It seems, however, to have been necessary for the Court to assert that conclusion in order to place its decision upon the ground that the act invaded the rights of the States.

It conceded that the general-welfare clause was a grant to Congress to tax and spend for purposes other than the specific grants of power contained in the same section and article of the Constitution. It denied, however, the application of that power to promotion of the welfare of agriculture on the ground that only matters involving "national welfare"—the Constitution uses the words "general welfare"—are included and that agriculture is made up of local conditions throughout the country. From that finding the Court based its holding that the States' rights doctrine prevented consideration of the general-welfare clause in this case.

It is also a strange and new construction when the Court holds that, notwithstanding there is express power in the Constitution to tax and appropriate for the general welfare, such action cannot be taken by Congress unless there is also a specific grant to tax and appropriate for the specific purpose on the theory that the rights reserved to the States prevent it.

This construction narrows to the point of practical destruction the power specifically granted to Congress to levy taxes to provide for the general welfare of the United States; and before concluding I shall attempt to point out the limitations put upon Congress by this decision.

The holding by the Court that agriculture is of purely local concern, ignoring the fact that distribution in interstate and foreign commerce as well as production is involved, is an astounding one. Whether the Court has reached that conclusion as a result of its right to take judicial notice of generally recognized and established conditions is not stated in the opinion. It is quite clear that such a conclusion cannot be based upon the facts in the record. It is also quite clear to any intelligent layman that the Court's conclusion on that point has no imaginative grounds of support.

The purpose of the act was to deal, in the aggregate, among other things, with the entire crop of cotton produced in 16 States, and its manufactured products sold in each State in the American Union. Surely that fact is known to every member of the Court. Since the establishment of our Government the balance of trade in favor of the United States has amounted to about $37,000,000,000. Raw cotton and cotton textile goods account for all of that balance of trade except approximately $3,000,000,000. Exports of cotton and the products thereof have brought to America practically all of the increase in national assets flowing out of our international commerce for nearly 150 years.

For many long years we have exported approximately 60 percent of the entire cotton crop, and for a number of years that trade brought to America from foreign countries nearly a billion dollars a year. The proceeds from that cotton, the Supreme Court seems to think, are a matter of local concern to the farmers and, therefore, only a local affair. The august Justices, while taking judicial notice of current affairs, should know, if they do not know, that practically all the money received for the sale of cotton ultimately moves into other sections of the United States in payment for the products of industry and for the products of wheat and corn throughout the West, and for specialty crops in Florida, California, and Texas.

Cheap cotton textiles are used by rich and poor alike everywhere. The continued supply of cotton and the financial capacity of the cotton growers to continue in the cotton production business are essential to this industry, of the very widest national importance. In view of this situation, recognized everywhere else, the Supreme Court has seen fit, as a ground for condemnation of the cotton-processing tax, to find that the general-welfare authority for the program cannot be invoked because the cotton industry is a local affair, cannot be made a national affair, and, therefore, the power to deal with its welfare in any way is by implication, reserved to the separate States.

I repeat that the foundation for the decision in this case crumbles unless it is held as a matter of law that the adjustment of the supply of cotton to the world's consumption demands is a matter which applies only to local and separate farms, and does not affect the general welfare of the United States. If that holding is not sound, then the Court has no basis for discarding the general-welfare power on the ground that its application is an invasion of the reserved rights of the States.

For the same reason it cannot hold that the "reserved rights" doctrine dominates this case.

The Court has declined to give effect to both clauses now under consideration. It holds that the reservation of rights not granted forbids the exercise of rights granted.

While, of course, wheat and corn and their products, and tobacco, and probably other agricultural commodities, have the same wide national interest, I am confining my statement chiefly to cotton because the case involves directly only cotton.

The decision of the Court is based upon findings of facts of which the Court assumes to have judicial knowledge. If the Court had been willing to recognize what I believe each Member of Congress, regardless of his attitude toward the Agricultural Adjustment Act or its wisdom, knows to be true—namely, that the cotton industry is affected with a broad national interest—then it would have been necessary for the Court to condemn the act on some ground other than that stated in the opinion. If the cotton industry is not viewed as solely a local one and its welfare left to the exclusive consideration of each separate State, then the power to tax and appropriate for the general welfare could not have been avoided by the Court; and it would have been necessary to find some other ground to pronounce the economic philosophy that is manifested by the written opinion.

In holding that legislation affecting the cotton industry was one of purely local application, the Court ignored and declined to give consideration to a finding by Congress contained in the Bankhead Cotton Act, which was before the Court and to which the Court's attention had been called. That finding was as follows:

It is prima facie presumed that all cotton and its processed products will move in interstate or foreign commerce.

The Court was dealing particularly with the cotton phase of the bill. It knew that Congress had made the finding just stated. In the face of that fact, the Court said, in effect, either the Congress had no right to make a finding of what constitutes a subject of national interest or ignored entirely its finding.

The Supreme Court has recognized the right of Congress to make findings on what matters affect the public interest. After declaring the first Grain Futures Act unconstitutional the Court, in the case of Board of Trade v. Olson (262 U. S. 1), said:

In the act we are considering Congress has expressly declared that transactions and prices of grain in dealing in futures are susceptible to speculation, manipulation, and control which are detrimental to the producer and consumer and persons handling grain in interstate commerce and render regulation imperative for the protection of such commerce and the national public interest therein.

It is clear from the citations, in the statement of the case, of evidence before committees of investigation as to manipulations of the futures market and their effect, that we would be unwarranted in rejecting the finding of Congress as unreasonable and that in our inquiry as to the validity of this legislation we must accept the view that such manipulation does work to the detriment of producers, consumers, shippers, and legitimate dealers in interstate commerce in grain and that it is a real abuse.

The question of price dominates trade between the States. Sales of an article which affect the country-wide price of the article directly affect the country-wide commerce in it. By reason and authority, therefore, in determining the validity of this act, we are prevented from questioning the conclusion of Congress that manipulation of the market for futures on the Chicago Board of Trade (mere local transactions) may, and from time to time does, directly burden and obstruct commerce between the States in grain, and that it recurs and is a constantly possible danger. For this reason Congress has the power to provide the appropriate means adopted in this act by which this abuse may be restrained and avoided.

Section 3 of the Grain Futures Act, upon which the above decision is predicated, is as follows:

SEC. 3. Transactions in grain involving the sale thereof for future delivery as commonly conducted on boards of trade and known as "futures" are affected with a national public interest; that such transactions are carried on in large volume by the public generally and by persons engaged in the business of buying and selling grain and the products and byproducts thereof in interstate commerce; that the prices involved in such transactions are generally quoted and disseminated throughout the United States and in foreign countries as a basis for determining the prices to the producer and the consumer of grain and the products and byproducts thereof and to facilitate the movement thereof in interstate commerce; that such transactions are utilized by shippers, dealers, millers, and others engaged in handling grain and the products and byproducts thereof in interstate commerce as a means of hedging themselves against possible loss through fluctuations in price; that the transactions and prices of grain on such boards of trade are susceptible to speculation, manipulation, and control, and sudden or unreasonable fluctuations in the prices thereof frequently occur as a result of such speculation, manipulation, or control, which are detrimental to the producer or the consumer and the persons handling grain and products and byproducts thereof in interstate commerce, and that such fluctuations in prices are an obstruction to and a burden upon interstate commerce in grain and the products and byproducts thereof and render regulation imperative for the protection of such commerce and the national public interest therein.

In the Grain Futures Act case the Court had held that an act along the same lines was an invasion of States' rights, but with this declaration by Congress in the new act the Court held that Congress had the power to make that declaration, and thereby removed it from the doctrine of the reserved rights of the States. With the declaration there pointed out by Congress, and to which the Court's attention had been specifically called, that they were dealing solely with the cotton tax, with an act all of which, not merely some of which, dealt with that subject, and that the commodity prima facie was presumed to move in interstate and foreign commerce.

The Court in the opinion I am now discussing has declined to follow the rule, without expressly overruling it, as laid down in the decision in the Grain Futures Act case. This decision is based upon the ground primarily that States' rights have been invaded in a local matter. Congress says it is not a local matter, in the case of cotton, as it said it was not in the matter of grain.

Faced with the declaration by Congress that trading in grain futures on the Chicago Board of Trade was affected by national public interest, the Supreme Court sustained the validity of the act regulating the exchange as within the power of Congress.

That the writer of the Triple A opinion labored upstream in working to the decision reached by the Court is evidenced by the conflicting statements in the opinion. At one place in the opinion it is stated:

It is not contended that this provision (the welfare clause) grants power to regulate agricultural production upon the theory that such legislation would promote the general welfare.

That is a most remarkable statement, in view of the briefs filed in the case. Shortly after that statement in the opinion the following statement appears:

Nevertheless, the Government asserts that warrant is found in this clause (the welfare clause) for the adoption of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. The argument is that Congress may appropriate and authorize the spending of moneys for the "general welfare"; that the phrase should be liberally construed to cover anything conducive to national welfare; that decision as to what will promote such welfare rests with Congress alone, and the courts may not review its determination; and, finally, that the appropriation under attack was in fact for the general welfare of the United States.

It is unfortunate that, in a case of such momentous consequences, in its immediate effects and as a new charter of power for the Supreme Court there should appear in a document of such historical and landmarking importance conflicting statements of fact by the Court itself.

The Court gravely holds that acreage-rental contracts made by the farmers are not voluntary but that benefit payments constitute the power to coerce or destroy. If the contracts were voluntary, then the reserved rights of the States were not violated. The voluntary sale or lease of lands to the Government for parks, forests, flood control, military camps, C. C. C. camps, and so forth, has never been regarded by bench or bar as a violation of States' rights. If the Government cannot make voluntary contracts with citizens of the States relating to subjects not specifically covered by specific grants of power, what becomes of the entire operations of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, the Farm Credit Agency, and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation? The opinion further states that "if the cotton grower elects not to accept the benefits, he will receive less for his crops; those who receive payments will be able to undersell him. The result may well be financial ruin."

Upon statements of that sort the Court reached the conclusion that coercion, even honest coercion, was used to the extent that these contracts were not voluntary but were involuntary.

The Court reaches the finding of fact which I have just quoted on the basis of an abstract theory and without any support by the record. Its conclusion is totally erroneous, unauthorized, and unjustified. No one who is familiar with the actual administration of the act or who ever touched elbow to elbow with the cotton growers during the administration of the act would make any such assertion.

The finding of the Court is in direct conflict with the declaration of Congress. The Agricultural Adjustment Act states that the program is to be carried out "through agreements with producers or by other voluntary methods." It is supposed that the Court was passing on the law as written and would be guided by its language. Congress did not intend and did not provide for in the Triple A Act any program that was not entirely voluntary. Yet the Court now asserts that the law is unconstitutional because, although the law provides for voluntary cooperation, that members of the Court, looking under and beyond the language of the law, entertain the economic philosophy that the declaration of Congress on the subject was a deception and a fraud. The Court seems to have labored under the impression that in order to avoid the application of the welfare clause and in order to hold that the program interfered with State rights it was necessary to reach the conclusion that the program was not a voluntary one on the part of the producers but that it was a compulsory program and based upon economic pressure.

The Court expressly predicates its invalidation of that part of the act under consideration on the ground that regardless of the power of Congress under the welfare clause to enact the law, it is foreclosed from doing so in this instance by another part of the Constitution reserving to the States the powers not delegated.

In short, the Court says that under the welfare clause the power to tax and to spend for the promotion of agriculture is granted to Congress if the object is the promotion of the national welfare; still, and notwithstanding that express grant, Congress cannot exercise the specific power granted, because of the State rights reservation.

The power granted to Congress in the welfare clause is as specific a grant as the others contained in the Constitution, though it may be more elastic. Why does the reserved-rights doctrine forbid Congress from exercising the "welfare" power and have no application to the other powers granted to Congress?

It is disturbing to have a program of such widespread value and touching the lives and fortunes of so many millions of people knocked down and destroyed, not because of any quoted provision of the Constitution or of any previous judicial decision, but solely because of the views of a majority of the judges on the effect of the application of the program, namely, whether a farmer who rents land to the Government for compensation does so voluntarily or under economic compulsion.

It is also disturbing for the Court to generate unhappiness and despair and also to start millions of people back to the poverty and starvation days growing out of excessive production as a result of their opinion that the plan provided by Congress, and expressly declared by Congress to be entirely a voluntary one, is in fact and in truth not what Congress provided—namely, a voluntary plan.

The statement of the Court "If the cotton grower elects not to accept the benefits, he will receive less for his crops; those who receive payments will be able to undersell him" is the most astonishing one in the entire finding of facts by the Court. In fact, it shows total ignorance of the practical operation of the program. The assertion may help the conclusion that the program is compulsory, but unfortunately the assertion is not supported by the true facts.

It was pointed out in the minority opinion that in 1934, 6,343,000 acres of productive cotton land, 14 percent of the total, did not participate in the plan, and in 1935, 2,790,000 acres, or 6 percent of the total, did not participate, and that of the total number of farms growing cotton, 33 percent did not participate in 1934 and 13 percent in 1935.

The known facts are that those who did not participate profited most, notwithstanding the assertion of fact to the contrary by our great Supreme Court. The Government paid 3½ cents per pound as rental based upon the average yield on the land during the 5-year base period adopted. The average yield during the same period was approximately one bale to 3 acres. For renting the 3 acres the farmer got $17.50 and had one bale less to sell. In 1934 and 1935 cotton averaged about $60 a bale. With practically the same supply of stock and labor the additional acreage upon the average farm could have been planted and with very small additional cost. The noncooperating farmer received $60 from his 3 acres, while the cooperating farmer received $17.50.

For reasons above stated, many farmers, in the exercise of their rights, refused to cooperate. The economic coercion drove them toward noncooperation from the standpoint of their immediate crop returns. These farmers, however, gradually came to understand and appreciate the fact that the cooperative rental program was responsible for the $60 a bale they were getting for their cotton, whereas before the program they were getting from $25 to $30 a bale. As a result of that understanding the number cooperating increased, but there was no sort of compulsion on them. They rented for the purpose of getting a higher price upon the cotton produced on the unrented land, and which they realized would be a larger amount than they would get if all farmers planted their previous cotton acreage.

The statement "those who receive payments will be able to undersell him" is one that will cause every cotton farmer in the South to laugh at the cotton intelligence of the learned judge who rendered the opinion and the judges who concurred. Cotton sells everywhere throughout the Cotton Belt at the world price, and that price is largely fixed at Liverpool. There is an open market every day in the year at prevailing uniform prices for all cotton offered on the market. To the cotton trade the cooperating producer and the noncooperating producer look exactly alike. They make no inquiry. They look at nothing but the bale of cotton. It will astound the people in the Cotton Belt to find that the Supreme Court has judicially determined that a cotton farmer will reduce the price of his cotton in order to undersell his neighbor. Who ever heard of such a thing before?

I had supposed that the members of the Supreme Court knew that the farmer has nothing to do with fixing the price of his cotton. I had supposed that the members of the Supreme Court knew that the buyers fix the price of all farmers' products. According to the declaration of the learned Court that a farmer receiving benefits would undersell those not receiving benefits, the same rule would, of course, apply to those having different cost of production. According to the view of the learned Court there is constant menace to the price of cotton growing out of the ability of farmers who have the richest land or have the lowest cost of production to rush into the market and push down the price of cotton because they can afford to undersell their less fortunate neighbor.

I have always had great respect for the courts. I think it is one of the most valuable attributes of American citizenship that the courts are held in high esteem and respect, and that there is with all good citizens a prompting to willingly obey the mandates of the courts. That respect, however, cannot always be blindly maintained unless the courts deserve it. For the sake of the respectful attitude of millions of men and women and children throughout the Cotton Belt who would laugh to scorn the statements of fact above quoted upon which the decision in this case largely rests, I very much hope that appropriate action will be taken by the Court to expunge them from the record.

If State rights have been invaded, as the Court seems to think, through economic coercion and the fear and danger of unfair trade competition in the matter of cotton prices, and it develops that such coercion and such trade menace does not exist, then upon what does this remarkable decision stand? Can Congress go into the States voluntarily, as Congress declares it was doing in this case, and avoid in any way the charge of the Supreme Court that it is not doing what it declared it intended to do?

Under the decision in this case many of the long-practiced activities of the Government must be discontinued. The decision holds that unless there is a specific grant of power the general-welfare clause cannot be exercised except for the national welfare as distinguished from local welfare. If the great national industry of agriculture spreading across the continent from the Atlantic to the Pacific Oceans covering cotton, wheat, corn, barley, oats, rice, and tobacco, and providing the food and clothing for all the people in the Nation does not affect the national welfare, then it is most difficult to sustain countless Government activities.

In the dissenting opinion, Judge Stone points out a number of Government appropriations which are used locally that must fall under the condemnation of the decision in this case because there is no specific grant in the Constitution under which they are made, other than the welfare clause. In addition to appropriations on the happening of earthquakes, fires, tornadoes, pestilence, and floods, all of which involve purely local welfare, there are many fields heretofore occupied by the Government which must be abandoned.

Appropriations for boll-weevil control are purely local if cotton is not recognized as involving national welfare. Appropriations for suppression of grasshopper epidemics, for the corn borer, and for tree insects fall under the same condemnation.

What specific authority is there in the Constitution for appropriations for flood control involving, among others, the great Mississippi River project? While the area involved is relatively large and the values of property involved are enormous, nevertheless the Mississippi Valley, which is to be safeguarded by the Mississippi River flood-control project, is a local area. Who can say, under the Supreme Court decision, that it involves the general welfare? Agriculture does not, as we are now advised.

Appropriations for agricultural experiment stations are used for local projects. If Congress follows the Supreme Court decision, these wonderfully useful projects must disappear.

There is no specific grant in the Constitution for the payment of old-age pensions. Until this time support of the aged has been accepted by the public as a local responsibility. It involves individuals in numerous localities. No one but the Supreme Court can now say whether the general welfare is involved in caring for the aged, the crippled, and helpless children. Let the friends of the Social Security Act understand now that if the Supreme Court adheres to its broad pronouncement in the A. A. A. case, the social-security program, of necessity, goes into the discard. That includes not only old-age pensions but the workmen's unemployment insurance.

Let the advocates of the Townsend plan direct their petitions and their efforts to the judiciary. Members of Congress cannot afford to violate their oaths to support the Constitution. That means, of course, as construed by the Supreme Court.

What about the Extension Service, the land-grant colleges, vocational rehabilitation, vocational education and public health, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, the Farm Credit Agency, and R. F. C.? There is no specific grant covering them. Do taxes and appropriations for them provide for the national welfare, as distinguished from a local activity, such as the Supreme Court holds agriculture to be?

Ask the Supreme Court. They are the sole judges under the Triple A decision.

It seems quite evident, judging by recent declarations by the Supreme Court, that progressively the Bankhead Cotton Act, the Smith-Kerr Tobacco Act, the Costigan-Jones Sugar Act, the Warren Potato Act, the Guffey Bituminous Coal Act, the Social Security Act, and possibly the T. V. A. Act will be repealed by the Supreme Court.

It is unfortunate, from the viewpoint of those of us who have always upheld the courts and intend to continue to do so, and who believe in the orderly processes established by the Constitution for conducting public affairs, that the present members of the Supreme Court are so generally believed to be influenced by their economic philosophy and by their views that the Constitution is not sufficiently elastic to cover a progressive social and economic evolution.

I beg to call attention to the following statement from the dissenting opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Stone, and concurred in by two other great justices. I call the statement to the special attention of those who may charge that I am unduly criticizing the Supreme Court:

> The power of courts to declare a statute unconstitutional is subject to two guiding principles of decision which ought never to be absent from judicial consciousness—

This is a statement by the minority following the conference of the justices in which the A. A. A. Act was condemned—

> One is that courts are concerned only with the power to enact statutes, not with their wisdom. The other is that while unconstitutional exercise of power by the executive and legislative branches of the Government is subject to judicial restraint, the only check upon our own exercise of power is our own sense of self-restraint. For the removal of unwise laws from the statute books appeal lies not to the courts but to the ballot and to the processes of democratic government.

That is a remarkably clear statement of the situation and will ring with increasing force down through the years to come. Mr. Justice Stone ably points out that there is an appeal from the action of unconstitutional exercise of power by the other two coordinate branches of the Government, but there is no appeal from the failure to exercise self-restraint by the Supreme Court. It is clear that the judge was expressing his view of the unrestrained attitude of the majority judges toward certain legislation.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, would it bother the Senator if I should interrupt at that point? If he prefers, I will wait until he concludes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I should prefer not to break into the continuity of my statement at this time.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well; I merely wanted to call attention to one provision of the Constitution.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the minority opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Stone is a legal classic. It upholds our form of representative government and the power of the representatives of the people in Congress to deal with the public purse, under the general-welfare clause as well as under the specific grants, and without the Court's arrogating to itself the power of nullification influenced by the viewpoint of judges that the legislation is wise or unwise.

In view of the remarkably clear presentation of the case, in the opinion by Mr. Justice Stone, I feel that it is important to make it available to the public libraries and to students of a representative government. I ask unanimous consent that immediately following my remarks the opinion of Mr. Justice Stone, concurred in by two other able judges, namely, Mr. Justice Brandeis and Mr. Justice Cardozo, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the dissenting opinion will be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Alabama.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the practical question presents itself, What are we going to do about it? Is there any way under orderly processes by which the Congress can protect itself from the action of a coordinate branch of the Government in divesting Congress of powers that it believes it possesses? I submit that problem for the thought and consideration of those who are interested in it, but without proposing at this time any definite formula as an answer.

For my own part, and speaking now primarily in the interest of agriculture, I do not propose to accept a defeatist attitude until other plans have been presented to Congress and every reasonable effort made to send them on their legislative and administrative way so that the Court may have another opportunity to pass upon the power of Congress to exercise the power granted to it under the welfare clause of the Constitution.

At present, but reserving the right to change my views as a result of further study of developments, I favor proceeding along the following general lines:

First. Pass a separate and independent bill relevying the processing tax as a general revenue measure.

Second. I favor an appropriation by Congress out of the general funds of the Treasury in a suitable and reasonable amount, and placing the funds at the disposition of the Secretary of Agriculture. The majority opinion contains the following statement:

> By the Agricultural Adjustment Act the amount of the tax is appropriated to be expended only in payment under contracts whereby the parties bind themselves to regulation by the Federal Government. There is an obvious difference between a statute stating the conditions upon which moneys shall be expended and one effective only upon assumption of a contractual obligation to submit to a regulation which otherwise could not be enforced. Many examples pointing the distinction might be cited.

In arriving at the conclusion that the voluntary plan set up in the Agricultural Adjustment Act was not a voluntary plan but was one of coercion, the Court laid considerable stress upon the requirements in the rental contracts that the farmers should comply with the Government regulations. This difficulty can be removed by observing the distinction pointed out by the Court and, instead of securing contracts of the type condemned by the Court, let the Secretary announce a formula for acreage adjustment followed with an assurance that on proof of full compliance with the formula the Government would pay benefit payments or a bounty. Such a program would entirely remove the objections now entertained by the Court based upon the idea that the contracts, when executed, constitute a form of compulsion and would follow the distinction which the Supreme Court appears to be willing to recognize.

Third. I favor a finding and declaration by Congress, as was done in the Grain Futures Act, that production and distribution of basic agricultural commodities directly affect interstate and foreign commerce and also directly affect the general welfare of the United States.

If Congress cannot appropriate money for bounties, benefits, or subsidies, then the shipping interests will be left high and dry. If it cannot appropriate money for a bonus, then the ex-service man will be made very unhappy. If it cannot appropriate money for benefits, then, of course, it cannot appropriate money for the relief of the aged, and at the same time the appropriation for the relief of the millions of unemployed will fall by the wayside.

There are doubtless groups of people in this country who are now rejoicing because of the apparent destruction of the farmers' program as contained in the Agricultural Adjustment Act. When these groups come to realize the sweeping and all-embracing effect of the decision on the power of Congress to make appropriations and realize that their own hopes are likely to be frustrated, there will doubtless be a difference in the attitude of millions of American people.

I propound the question with all seriousness: Is it possible that views on the wisdom of this particular legislation had either a conscious or unconscious influence upon the block of so-called conservative judges who laid down this new rule of State rights in the face of, and with express rejection of the application of, a specific grant to Congress?

The Court, more than once in the opinion, in discussing the power of Congress to invade State rights, attempted to show that the adjustment program was compulsory, or that the economic pressure was equivalent to compulsion. It said:

> The Congress cannot invade State jurisdiction to compel individual action; no more can it purchase such action.

It said at another place in the opinion:

> Congress has no power to enforce its command on the farmer to the ends sought by the Agricultural Adjustment Act. It must follow that it may not indirectly accomplish those ends by taxing and spending to purchase compliance.

It further said:

> It does not help to declare that local conditions throughout the Nation have created a situation of national concern, for this is but to say that whenever there is a widespread similarity in conditions Congress may ignore constitutional limitations upon its own powers and usurp those reserved to the States.

I hope the friends of true remedial and progressive measures will comprehend the full significance of that statement.

The last statement quoted is totally faulty for two reasons: First, it assumes that, however widespread local agricultural conditions may be and although they may affect every community and every interest in the country, still agricultural affairs cannot become a matter of national interest. It is also faulty and unsound for the reason that it totally rejects the power of Congress under the welfare clause to spend for agriculture, if the condition of agriculture affects the national welfare.

In short, the Court recognizes the power of Congress to spend under the welfare clause on subjects affecting the national welfare, but holds that agriculture can in no event affect the national welfare.

It is disturbing to thoughtful citizens who understand the fallacy of that judicial conclusion, because the declaration of the Court requires the Government to deal with farming as millions of separate units. It excludes the idea that processors, distributors, and consumers in the cities everywhere, who are dependent upon the products of the farm, have no interest in agriculture as an industry. It is the first pronouncement that has been made by any branch of this Government that agriculture and its welfare are not a subject of national interest.

It is not my view that the Agricultural Adjustment Act has been destroyed and declared unconstitutional by the decision in the Hoosac Mills case. That judgment dealt only with a review of the judgment rendered by the circuit court of appeals. The only point under consideration was the enforcement of the processing tax and the plan for spending that tax money. The Supreme Court held that the collection of the tax could not be enforced because it was levied and appropriated for a purpose beyond the power of Congress. I do not know what conclusion would have been reached by the Court if the appropriation of the processing tax for specific agricultural purposes had not been contained in the Agricultural Adjustment Act. No one doubts the power of Congress to levy a processing tax as a revenue measure.

In justice to myself as a member of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry who supported the Agricultural Adjustment Act, I beg to state that in the amendments I proposed the elimination from the bill of the section appropriating the tax. I was supported in that view by able lawyers upon the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Our view, however, was not acceptable to others whose agreement was necessary.

There are many phases of the Agricultural Adjustment Act which have not been touched or invalidated by the decision. It seems to me that the way is clear for us to rewrite the Agricultural Adjustment Act without including any tax provision and also eliminate the acreage contracts, which have so profoundly shocked the consciences of the Supreme Court majority. The real and true friends of the farmers, and all who recognize the value to all interests in this country, of purchasing power in the hands of nearly half of our total population, will not quietly retire and meekly refrain from further efforts to work out an agricultural program if one can be found not in conflict with the decision rendered by the Court.

When an appropriation is made to be used by the Secretary of Agriculture in a beneficial adjustment program, if there are those who desire to contest the power of Congress to make appropriations for that purpose, a splendid opportunity will be afforded to test also the legality of countless appropriations that are annually made for useful governmental purposes, but which can be sustained only by reference to the general-welfare clause.

It should not be forgotten that only the original Agricultural Adjustment Act was before the Court. The amendments passed during the last session of Congress made many changes in the original act and added new provisions. That act is still in effect, except that phase of it relating to the processing taxes and the appropriation of the taxes for agricultural-production control.

It is inevitable that a race of production will take place this year if Government aid in securing an adjustment of production is abandoned. Price recessions will not immediately occur because the supply of basic farm commodities is reasonably adjusted except in the case of cotton. With new crops prices will decline under the operations of the law of supply and demand. If this administration is deprived of aiding farmers to get a fair price through methods heretofore so successfully employed, it has another way to accomplish the same result. Speaking only for myself, I very much hope that power will be exercised by the administration. If it becomes necessary, the President can protect farm prices by increasing the currency. He has the power and I think he should exercise it to issue currency against all the silver owned by the Government and against the gold profits now lying sterile in the Treasury.

It seems incredible that a currency expansion, covered by 100-percent gold, could in any way impair the soundness of our money. Expansion of the currency within the stated limits will doubtless protect farm prices.

Having concluded my formal statement, I am glad now to yield to the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, perhaps it is not quite in order, but the Senator suggested that some measure may be introduced to meet the objections raised by the Supreme Court. In considering legislation on this subject I desire to draw attention to a provision of the Constitution found in section 2, article III, page 384, of the Senate Manual. The language is very plain, and yet I do not know of precedents and I do not know whether the question reaches as far as it might seem to reach. I do not know of an instance where Congress has attempted to impose exceptions and regulations such as this section provides. Section 2, article III, of the Constitution reads as follows:

> In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a State shall be party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions, and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

That seems to me an important provision. As I say, it is possible that Congress heretofore has not attempted to make exceptions or to enact regulations limiting or restricting the jurisdiction of the appellate court; but under this provision of the Constitution has not Congress the power and the right to do it?

This whole subdivision of the Constitution, article III, bears on the subject of the judicial power of the United States, and in section 2 the Constitution outlines the jurisdiction of the Court. Then this provision also is inserted, which says that Congress shall have power to make exceptions and regulations in connection with appellate jurisdiction.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think the Senator from Florida has made a very valuable contribution to the problems now confronting us. Of course, I assume that most Senators have given some thought to the question presented by the Senator from Florida; namely, whether or not Congress should limit, in some reasonable way, the power of the Supreme Court to act on matters on which Congress says they should not act.

I think it is clear, from a reading of the article of the Constitution cited by the Senator, that Congress has the power to make all exceptions from that jurisdiction that Congress sees fit to make. The Constitution gave the Supreme Court both original and appellate power, and then, as the Senator has pointed out, made that general power, that all-embracing power which they have exercised since the foundation of the Government, subject to exceptions which Congress in its wisdom may see fit to adopt; and, of course, if the present trend shall continue, it may become necessary for Congress to recognize that situation and take suitable action.

EXHIBIT A

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 401.—October Term, 1935

United States of America, Petitioner, v. William M. Butler et al., Receivers of Hoosac Mills Corporation. On writ of certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the First Circuit. (January 6, 1936)

Mr. Justice STONE: I think the judgment should be reversed.

The present stress of widely held and strongly expressed differences of opinion of the wisdom of the Agricultural Adjustment Act makes it important, in the interest of clear thinking and sound result, to emphasize at the outset certain propositions which should have controlling influence in determining the validity of the act. They are:

1. The power of courts to declare a statute unconstitutional is subject to two guiding principles of decision which ought never to be absent from judicial consciousness. One is that courts are concerned only with the power to enact statutes, not with their wisdom. The other is that while unconstitutional exercise of power by the executive and legislative branches of the Government is subject to judicial restraint, the only check upon our own exercise of power is our own sense of self-restraint. For the removal of unwise laws from the statute books, appeal lies not to the courts but to the ballot and to the processes of democratic government.

2. The constitutional power of Congress to levy an excise tax upon the processing of agricultural products is not questioned. The present levy is held invalid, not for any want of power in Congress to lay such a tax to defray public expenditures, including those for the general welfare, but because the use to which its proceeds are put is disapproved.

3. As the present depressed state of agriculture is Nation-wide in its extent and effects, there is no basis for saying that the expenditure of public money in aid of farmers is not within the specifically granted power of Congress to levy taxes to "provide for the * * * general welfare." The opinion of the Court does not declare otherwise.

4. No question of a variable tax fixed from time to time by fiat of the Secretary of Agriculture, or of unauthorized delegation of legislative power, is now presented. The schedule of rates imposed by the Secretary in accordance with the original command of Congress has since been specifically adopted and confirmed by act of Congress, which has declared that it shall be the lawful tax. Act of August 24, 1935, — Statute —. That is the tax which the Government now seeks to collect. Any defects there may have been in the manner of laying the tax by the Secretary have now been removed by the exercise of the power of Congress to pass a curative statute validating an intended, though defective tax (United States v. Heintzen & Co., 206 U. S. 370; Graham & Foster v. Goodcell, 282 U. S. 409; cf. Milliken v. United States, 283 U. S. 15). The Agricultural Adjustment Act as thus amended declares that none of its provisions shall fail because others are pronounced invalid.

It is with these preliminary and hardly controverted matters in mind that we should direct our attention to the pivot on which the decision of the Court is made to turn. It is that a levy unquestionably within the taxing power of Congress may be treated as invalid because it is a step in a plan to regulate agricultural production and is thus a forbidden infringement of State power. The levy is not any the less an exercise of taxing power because it is intended to defray an expenditure for the general welfare rather than for some other support of government. Nor is the levy and collection of the tax pointed to as effecting the regulation. While all Federal taxes inevitably have some influence on the internal economy of the States, it is not contended that the levy of a processing tax upon manufacturers using agricultural products as raw material has any perceptible regulatory effect upon either their production or manufacture. The tax is unlike the penalties which were held invalid in the Child Labor Tax case (259 U. S. 20), in Hill v. Wallace (259 U. S. 44), in Linder v. United States (268 U. S. 5, 17), and in United States v. Constantine, decided December 11, 1935, because they were themselves the instruments of regulation by virtue of their coercive effect on matters left to the control of the States. Here regulation, if any there be, is accomplished not by the tax but by the method by which its proceeds are expended, and would equally be accomplished by any like use of public funds, regardless of their source.

The method may be simply stated. Out of the available fund payments are made to such farmers as are willing to curtail their productive acreage, who in fact do so and who in advance have filed their written undertaking to do so with the Secretary of Agriculture. In saying that this method of spending public moneys is an invasion of the reserved powers of the States, the Court does not assert that the expenditure of public funds to promote the general welfare is not a substantive power specifically delegated to the National Government, as Hamilton and Story pronounced it to be. It does not deny that the expenditure of funds for the benefit of farmers and in aid of a program of curtailment of production of agricultural products, and thus of a supposedly better ordered national economy, is within the specifically granted power. But it is declared that State power is nevertheless infringed by the expenditure of the proceeds of the tax to compensate farmers for the curtailment of their cotton acreage. Although the farmer is placed under no legal compulsion to reduce acreage, it is said that the mere offer of compensation for so doing is a species of economic coercion which operates with the same legal force and effect as though the curtailment were made mandatory by act of Congress. In any event it is insisted that even though not coercive the expenditure of public funds to induce the recipients to curtail production is itself an infringement of State power, since the Federal Government cannot invade the domain of the States by the "purchase" of performance of acts which it has no power to compel.

Of the assertion that the payments to farmers are coercive, it is enough to say that no such contention is pressed by the taxpayer, and no such consequences were to be anticipated or appear to have resulted from the administration of the act. The suggestion of coercion finds no support in the record or in any data showing the actual operation of the act. Threat of loss, not hope of gain, is the essence of economic coercion. Members of a long-depressed industry have undoubtedly been tempted to curtail acreage by the hope of resulting better prices and by the proffered opportunity to obtain needed ready money. But there is nothing to indicate that those who accepted benefits were impelled by fear of lower prices if they did not accept, or that at any stage in the operation of the plan a farmer could say whether, apart from the certainty of cash payments at specified times, the advantage would lie with curtailment of production plus compensation, rather than with the same or increased acreage plus the expected rise in prices which actually occurred. Although the Agricultural Adjustment Act was put into operation in June 1933, the official reports of the Department of Agriculture show that 6,343,000 acres of productive cotton land, 14 percent of the total, did not participate in the plan in 1934, and 2,790,000 acres, 6 percent of the total, did not participate in 1935. Of the total number of farms growing cotton, estimated at 1,500,000, 33 percent in 1934 and 13 percent in 1935 did not participate.

It is significant that in the congressional hearings on the bill that became the Bankhead Act (48 Stat. 598), as amended by act of June 20, 1934 (48 Stat. 1184), which imposes a tax of 50 percent on all cotton produced in excess of limits prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, there was abundant testimony that the restriction of cotton production attempted by the Agricultural Adjustment Act could not be secured without the coercive provisions of the Bankhead Act. See hearing before Committee on Agriculture, United States Senate, on S. 1974, Seventy-third Congress, second session; hearing before Committee on Agriculture, United States House of Representatives, on H. R. 8402, Seventy-third Congress, second session. The Senate and House committees so reported, Senate Report No. 283, Seventy-third Congress, second session, page 3; House Report No. 867, Seventy-third Congress, second session, page 3. The report of the Department of Agriculture on the administration of the Agricultural Adjustment Act (Feb. 15, 1934, to Dec. 31, 1934), page 50, points out that the Bankhead Act was passed in response to a strong sentiment in favor of mandatory production control "that would prevent noncooperating farmers from increasing their own plantings in order to capitalize upon the price advances that had resulted from the reductions made by contract signers."[1] The presumption of constitutionality of a statute is not to be overturned by an assertion of its coercive effect which rests on nothing more substantial than groundless speculation.

It is upon the contention that State power is infringed by purchased regulation of agricultural production that chief reliance is placed. It is insisted that, while the Constitution gives to Congress, in specific and unambiguous terms, the power to tax and spend, the power is subject to limitations which do not find their origin in any express provision of the Constitution and to which other expressly delegated powers are not subject.

The Constitution requires that public funds shall be spent for a defined purpose, the promotion of the general welfare. Their expenditure usually involves payment on terms which will insure use by the selected recipients within the limits of the constitutional purpose. Expenditures would fail of their purpose and thus lose their constitutional sanction if the terms of payment were not such that by their influence on the action of the recipients the permitted end would be attained. The power of Congress to spend is inseparable from persuasion to action over which Congress has no legislative control. Congress may not command that the science of agriculture be taught in State universities. But if it would aid the teaching of that science by grants to State institutions it is appropriate, if not necessary, that the grant be on the condition, incorporated in the Morrill Act (12 Stat. 503, 26 Stat. 417), that it be used for the intended purpose. Similarly it would seem to be compliance with the Constitution, not violation of it, for the Government to take and the university to give a contract that the grant would be so used. It makes no difference that there is a promise to do an act which the condition is calculated to induce. Condition and promise are alike valid, since both are in furtherance of the national purpose for which the money is appropriated.

These effects upon individual action, which are but incidents of the authorized expenditure of Government money, are pronounced to be themselves a limitation upon the granted power, and so the time-honored principle of constitutional interpretation that the granted power includes all those which are incident to it is reversed. "Let the end be legitimate," said the great Chief Justice, "let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional" McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat. 316, 421). This cardinal guide to constitutional exposition must now be rephrased so far as the spending power of the Federal Government is concerned. Let the expenditure be to promote the general welfare, still, if it is needful in order to insure its use for the intended purpose to influence any action which Congress cannot command because within the sphere of State government the expenditure is unconstitutional. And taxes otherwise lawfully levied are likewise unconstitutional if they are appropriated to the expenditure whose incident is condemned.

Congress, through the Interstate Commerce Commission, has set aside intrastate railroad rates. It has made and destroyed intrastate industries by raising or lowering tariffs. These results are said to be permissible because they are incidents of the commerce power and the power to levy duties on imports. See Minnesota Rate cases (230 U. S. 352), Shreveport Rate cases (234 U. S. 342), Board of Trustees of the University of Illinois v. United States (289 U. S. 48). The only conclusion to be drawn is that results become lawful when they are incidents of those powers but unlawful when incident to the similarly granted power to tax and spend.

Such a limitation is contradictory and destructive of the power to appropriate for the public welfare and is incapable of practical application. The spending power of Congress is in addition to the legislative power, and not subordinate to it. This independent grant of the power of the purse, and its very nature, involving in its exercise the duty to insure expenditure within the granted power, presuppose freedom of selection among divers ends and aims and the capacity to impose such conditions as will render the choice effective. It is a contradiction in terms to say that there is power to spend for the national welfare while rejecting any power to impose conditions reasonably adapted to the attainment of the end which alone would justify the expenditure.

The limitation now sanctioned must lead to absurd consequences. The Government may give seeds to farmers but may not condition the gift upon their being planted in places where they are most needed, or even planted at all. The Government may give money to the unemployed but may not ask that those who get it shall give labor in return or even use it to support their families. It may give money to sufferers from earthquake, fire, tornado, pestilence, or flood, but may not impose conditions—health precautions designed to prevent the spread of disease, or induce the movement of population to safer or more sanitary areas. All that, because it is purchased regulation infringing State powers, must be left for the States, who are unable or unwilling to supply the necessary relief. The Government may spend its money for vocational rehabilitation (48 Stat. 389), but it may not, with the consent of all concerned, supervise the process which it undertakes to aid. It may spend its money for the suppression of the boll weevil but may not compensate the farmers for suspending the growth of cotton in the infected areas. It may aid State reforestation and forest fire prevention agencies (43 Stat. 653) but may not be permitted to supervise their conduct. It may support rural schools (39 Stat. 929, 45 Stat. 1151, 48 Stat. 792) but may not condition its grant by the requirement that certain standards be maintained. It may appropriate moneys to be expended by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation "to aid in financing agriculture, commerce, and industry", and to facilitate "the exportation of agricultural and other products." Do all its activities collapse because, in order to effect the permissible purpose, in myriad ways the money is paid out upon terms and conditions which influence action of the recipients within the States which Congress cannot command? The answer would seem plain. If the expenditure is for a national public purpose, that purpose will not be thwarted because payment is on condition which will advance that purpose. The action which Congress induces by payments of money to promote the general welfare, but which it does not command or coerce, is but an incident to a specifically granted power, but a permissible means to a legitimate end. If appropriation in aid of a program of curtailment of agricultural production is constitutional—and it is not denied that it is—payment to farmers on condition that they reduce their crop acreage is constitutional. It is not any the less so because the farmer at his own option promises to fulfill the condition.

That the governmental power of the purse is a great one is not now for the first time announced. Every student of the history of government and economics is aware of its magnitude and of its existence in every civilized government. Both were well understood by the framers of the Constitution when they sanctioned the grant of the spending power to the Federal Government, and both were recognized by Hamilton and Story, whose views of the spending power as standing on a parity with the other powers specifically granted have hitherto been generally accepted.

The suggestion that it must now be curtailed by judicial fiat because it may be abused by unwise use hardly rises to the dignity of argument. So may judicial power be abused. "The power to tax is the power to destroy", but we do not, for that reason, doubt its existence or hold that its efficacy is to be restricted by its incidental or collateral effect upon the States. (See Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 8 Wall. 533; McCray v. United States, 195 U. S. 27; compare Magnano Co. v. Hamilton, 292 U. S. 40.) The power to tax and spend is not without constitutional restraints. One restriction is that the purpose must be truly national. Another is that it may not be used to coerce action left to State control. Another is the conscience and patriotism of Congress and the Executive. "It must be remembered that legislators are the ultimate guardians of the liberties and welfare of the people in quite as great a degree as the courts." (Justice Holmes, in Missouri, Kansas & Texas R. R. Co. v. May, 194 U. S. 267, 270.)

A tortured construction of the Constitution is not to be justified by recourse to extreme examples of reckless congressional spending which might occur if courts could not prevent expenditures which, even if they could be thought to effect any national purpose, would be possible only by action of a legislature lost to all sense of public responsibility. Such suppositions are addressed to the mind accustomed to believe that it is the business of courts to sit in judgment on the wisdom of legislative action. Courts are not the only agency of government that must be assumed to have capacity to govern. Congress and the courts both, unhappily, may falter or be mistaken in the performance of their constitutional duty. But interpretation of our great charter of government which proceeds on any assumption that the responsibility for the preservation of our institutions is the exclusive concern of any one of the three branches of government, or that it alone can save them from destruction, is far more likely in the long run "to obliterate the constituent members" of "an indestructible Union of indestructible States" than the frank recognition that language, even of a constitution, may mean what it says: that the power to tax and spend includes the power to relieve a Nation-wide economic maladjustment by conditional gifts of money.

Mr. Justice Brandeis and Mr. Justice Cardozo join in this opinion.

[1] Whether coercion was the sole or the dominant purpose of the Bankhead Act, or whether the act was designed also for revenue or other legitimate ends, there is no occasion to consider now.

THE PRESIDENT'S RECENT ADDRESS TO CONGRESS

Mr. HASTINGS obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum having been suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Clark	Harrison	Nye
Ashurst	Connally	Hastings	O'Mahoney
Austin	Coolidge	Hatch	Overton
Bachman	Copeland	Hayden	Pittman
Bailey	Costigan	Holt	Pope
Bankhead	Couzens	Johnson	Radcliffe
Barbour	Davis	Keyes	Robinson
Benson	Dickinson	King	Russell
Bilbo	Dieterich	Lewis	Schwellenbach
Borah	Donahey	Logan	Sheppard
Brown	Duffy	Lonergan	Smith
Bulkley	Fletcher	McAdoo	Steiwer
Bulow	Frazier	McGill	Thomas, Okla.
Burke	George	McKellar	Thomas, Utah
Byrd	Gerry	McNary	Trammell
Byrnes	Gibson	Minton	Truman
Capper	Glass	Moore	Vandenberg
Caraway	Gore	Murray	Van Nuys
Carey	Guffey	Norbeck	Wagner
Chavez	Hale	Norris	White

Mr. ROBINSON. I reannounce the absence of certain Senators as announced by me on the former roll call, and the reasons therefor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, upon Friday, when the Congress convened, arrangement was made at the President's request for a joint session to hear the President of the United States. At 9 o'clock at night, with the floodlights of the House trained upon him, and with the wavelengths of the radio monopolized, his fellow countrymen heard one of the most remarkable addresses ever delivered upon the state of the Union. It was truly a fighting speech. The President told the autocrats abroad and the autocrats at home how he could hate when he wanted to hate, and demonstrated how easy it was for him to write and speak hateful words which could be so readily understood by the people he hated.

He undertook to make plain, without mentioning them, the countries he intended to abuse. These words, instead of promoting peace, may very well be taken by those countries as a deliberate effort to create a controversy. The autocrats at home are the industrial and financial groups which, he says, have dominated the Government for the 12 years which succeeded the World War; that is, from the beginning of the Harding administration until the end of the Hoover administration; in other words, between the two Democratic administrations, of Wilson and Roosevelt. This demonstrates that the speech was not wholly nonpartisan, after all, and that the President did have some interest in convincing his radio audience, as well as the Democrats in Congress, that there would be some danger of returning to an autocracy if he were not reelected.

I do not think the President gave a full and complete picture of the state of the Union in his radio broadcast Friday night.

I should like to be permitted to state some pertinent things about the state of the Union which the President did not mention; or, putting it in another way, I think the President would have been more nearly accurate and would have presented a better picture of what his administration had done if he had said something like this:

The candor which should guide us in our dealings with each other permits me to tell you that the state of the Union is not so good. For 34 long months I have been President of the United States. It will be remembered that in my election I received a certain mandate from the people. I had promised to reduce Government expenses by 25 percent, to abolish and consolidate useless bureaus, and to eliminate waste and extravagance. I promised that Government expenses should not exceed the income, or, in other words, that the Budget would be balanced. I promised to maintain sound money at all hazards. I promised to keep the Government out of business, and I also promised to enforce the antitrust laws, as well as a lot of other things that I knew were for the best interests of the Government.

In my inaugural address I called attention to the fact that we must put our national house in order and make our income balance the outgo. Six days later I addressed a special message to the Congress, calling attention to the fact that by the end of the fiscal year 1934 there would be an accumulated deficit of $5,000,000,000 unless the Congress followed the suggestions I then made.

I am sorry to report that I have not been able to keep the promises made about the reduction of Government expenses; and you, of course, know without my telling you that I was not able to keep the deficit within the five billions I mentioned on March 10, 1933, even though the Congress was good enough to grant me the power requested.

I cannot quite explain to the Congress what it was that went wrong with my fiscal plans. I must say to you frankly that we know not whither we are going. Our national debt has reached the stupendous figure of more than thirty and one-half billion dollars. This is a new high record for all time. It is billions higher than when my administration took charge of your Government on March 4, 1933, and just now, as the Congress convenes, the picture of the future has a dreary appearance. Our deficit is increasing and increasing; with only 6 months of the current year gone by, our Federal deficit has reached nearly $2,000,000,000. Let me emphasize that this is for only a period of 6 months. What it will be at the end of the next 6 months is a matter of speculation. Waste and extravagance in the conduct of your Government have led us into a morass of financial trouble from which we can extricate ourselves only by a display of the utmost determination and courage.

Since last I addressed you on the state of the Union the Treasury has been busy borrowing money. This has helped somewhat to confuse our fiscal affairs. Yet with all this skyrocketing of expenditures, as we spend $2 for every dollar we take in, as our deficit and our debt enlarge, and as we go merrily along borrowing more and more, I am happy to tell you that we are approaching a balancing of the Budget, and that for the moment there is no danger of any new taxes.

It seems to me that it is not too much to say that we have come upon evil times. Unemployment continues to be with us, the number of the unemployed being, according to no less an authority than the American Federation of Labor, 11,672,187. This is true notwithstanding the fact that I have spent billions of the people's money in trying to improve this situation. Today, however, many of our people are still in need of relief; many are without shelter, despite the efforts of my friend, Dr. Tugwell. Just why this should be true, in view of the fact that recovery is here, is something I cannot explain to the Congress. With all of the millions of dollars that have been expended in order to bring about this recovery, I have been able to find jobs for only 30 percent of those who were unemployed. It is not quite fair to say that we planned it this way, although I do not like to admit that any of my plans have failed. I want you to know, however, that experiments proceed, particularly in rural electrification, emergency housing, and the resettlement administration. These are ambitious programs, but I do not think that at this time I should burden you with any of their details. I am sure time will cure all things, and I beg of you to have no fear.

Doubts cloud my mind as to the relief program beginning with the next fiscal year, but we have invited battle, and selfish interests and economic autocrats shall not prevail. We have already established the greatest bureaucracy in history. More than 100 new agencies have been created; machine politics governs practically all appointments to these bureaus. Today I can report to you that approximately 200,000 Government employees are outside the civil service. Our regular pay roll has been increasing rapidly during my administration, until today there are more than 800,000 Federal employees. In addition to that we had more than 100,000 Triple A agents engaged on a per-diem basis, and only last month the number of persons receiving Government pay checks reached the astounding figure of 9,047,956. It will be observed that we have thus succeeded in increasing the number of persons receiving monthly checks until their number equals about 25 percent of all of the votes cast in the last general election, and the Government dispenses to these persons the huge sum of $5,387,555,364 annually.

Our commerce is depreciating in value and in quantity. In practically no time at all, pursuing our present policies, American boats will no longer be needed on the high seas. We have recently repaired our tariff walls. We have negotiated reciprocal-tariff treaties, and as a result of so doing we have lost foreign markets for our farmers, and now import commodities we used to export. We are, however, I assure you, good neighbors. We are, for the present at least, at peace abroad. At home we wage war. Your Government is now striving its best to arouse class hatreds, to pit class against class, and your Executive leads this battle.

I think, however, that with respect to the importation of foreign products, I ought to explain to you that I permitted Mr. Wallace to kill too many pigs and prohibit the farmers from planting enough wheat and enough corn. But this is not because we did not plan it properly. It was due to an "act of God" in refusing to send the rain which we expected under normal conditions. But I ask my countrymen, how in the world was I to tell that "it wasn't going to rain any more"?

There is another condition in the country to which I think I ought to call your attention. One of the things that has bothered me the most is the Federal Constitution. We have departed from the Americanism of our forefathers to take up the socialistic doctrines which abound in alien lands. We have done this wherever we could under the terms of the Constitution, and we have interpreted the Constitution in accordance with the ideas prevailing with the best brains that are around and about me.

One of our latest digressions from the doctrine of those who have gone before us is the effort of our Government to wipe out State lines, destroy the autonomous governments of our Commonwealths, and centralize in Washington, removed from the control of the economic autocrats, the new United States autocracy. Only recently members of my cabinet have recommended that we divide these United States into 10 or more Federal subcapitals. This is somewhat along the line which leads to the heart of socialism, and it has been approached with great deliberation. These recommendations follow closely the concept of the proposed Constitution for the "Socialist Commonwealth of America." That instrument was drafted by the Socialist Lawyers' Association, upon which committee served such distinguished men as Felix Cohen, E. Michael White, David I. Asche, and Jacob Karo. Article 6 of this constitution of the Socialist Commonwealth of America provides for regional government. Article 6 reads as follows:

> It shall be the duty of Congress to divide the territory of the commonwealth into such regions as it may determine for the purpose of limited self-government and shall issue to such regions charters of local self-government.
> The charters for each particular region shall be drafted by a convention elected by the inhabitants of that region and after adoption by a majority of such inhabitants shall be submitted to Congress for its approval.

I have no recommendations to make upon this subject at the present time. I think it needs careful study before any action is taken upon it.

In conclusion, while I have neglected to be specific about certain things in which you are interested, let me assure you that I have no desire to be evasive. I repeat that we are going through difficult times. Out of this situation it is most difficult for any one man to grasp the details of government. But we must advance. There must be no retreat. It will probably be necessary to spend much more money. I want to leave with you one thought. It is not actually a recommendation, but you might bear in mind this little couplet:

> Borrow and spend—in November to win,
> Let's squander ten billions; come, pals, pitch in;
> Do not hesitate, do not fear,
> We must do it—this is election year.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], being unable to answer to his own satisfaction the address of the President, presumes to tell the Senate of the United States and the country what the President should have said in his message to Congress. If this speech of the Senator from Delaware had occurred anywhere else than on the floor of the Senate, it would be criticized by everyone who heard it as an unparalleled impertinence. If the President of the United States should take the conception of the Senator from Delaware as his ideal of duty in discharging his exalted responsibilities, the country would be horrified.

The Senator from Delaware is bold—I cannot say arrogant; the rules of the Senate do not permit that—when he rises here and assumes to speak for the President of the United States. The one certain way to make doubtful the utterance of the President would be to make it approvable by the Senator from Delaware. The latter stands for everything to which the President is opposed. He stands against almost everything that the majority of his colleagues on the other side of the Chamber favor.

The Senator from Delaware referred during the course of his remarks to conditions pertaining to unemployment, and he blamed the President for them. The President in his address, which the Senator has impliedly criticized, made a challenge to the Senator from Delaware of which the latter has taken no notice. "If you are against the measures that have been taken, then why do you not propose their repeal?" My retort to your answer would be that the great majority of your colleagues voted for all of them.

One significant fact which the able Senator from Delaware ignores in his remarks is that under the administration of President Roosevelt conditions which, if not brought about by the administration for which the Senator from Delaware stands, in any event existed at their termination, conditions that appalled the people of this Nation, have been materially improved. The record shows, and the Senator from Delaware is familiar with it—I assume that he is familiar with it, because he admits that he has knowledge of current events—that the business of the country has greatly improved, and that many of the important enterprises in which our people are engaged are approaching the peak of all time.

The Senator from Delaware is a master in the use of irony and sarcasm. One would not think it from hearing him talk, but he is really a good fellow at heart; and I know when he rises in this Chamber, and has no argument to make in which he has real confidence, that he resorts to the strategy which he has employed this afternoon. He may attempt impliedly to ridicule the President's message to Congress if he pleases, but deep down in his heart he cannot escape the conviction that the message rang from limit to limit of this country, and contained a challenge which he has neither the courage nor the ability to meet.

I heard the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON], my candidate for Republican nominee for President [laughter], make some side remarks during the course of my observations. What they were, I do not know. I say "my candidate for Republican nominee for President" because I think he represents just what the Senator from Delaware stands for; and if Roosevelt cannot defeat any candidate on that sort of a platform in every State in this Union in 1936, then I confess—what the Senator from Delaware would now maintain to be true—that I am no political prophet. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware proposes nothing. He advocates nothing. He is a little galled in the withers, a little sore on the back, a little lame on foot, a little stammering in speech when he refers to the remarks of the President of the United States arraigning the Senator from Delaware and those who stand with him for their lack of loyalty to the real cause of the people of the United States.

What did the Senator suggest should be done? What proposals does he make? The answer is, none.

It is easy to criticize. Even one with less intelligence than the Senator from Delaware demonstrates can criticize; but the real test, both of patriotism and of intelligence, is the ability to suggest something helpful when reform or advancement is needed.

I had not expected to say anything. In conclusion of my remarks I should like to impress on the mind of the Senator from Delaware, if it be possible to do so, that he does not speak for the President. He cannot tell the President what to say; and if he has nothing to say for himself, he had better keep silent. [Laughter.]

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, another body of the Congress is now considering the bill (H. R. 9870) to provide for the immediate payment of World War adjusted-service certificates, for the cancelation of unpaid interest accrued on loans secured by such certificates, and for other purposes. Inasmuch as this bill will probably be acted upon by the other body within the next day or two, and will then come to the Senate, and because of the general interest in the measure throughout the country, I ask unanimous consent that the bill as reported by the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives be printed in the RECORD at this point in connection with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oklahoma? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The bill (H. R. 9870) to provide for the immediate payment of the World War adjusted-service certificates, for the cancelation of unpaid interest accrued on loans secured by such certificates, and for other purposes, as reported by the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding the provisions of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended (U. S. C. 1934 ed., title 38, ch. 11), the adjusted-service certificates issued under the authority of such act are hereby declared to be immediately payable. Payments on account of such certificates shall be made in the manner hereinafter provided upon application therefor to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and upon surrender of the certificates and all rights thereunder (with or without the consent of the beneficiaries thereof). The payment in each case shall be in an amount equal to the face value of the certificate, except that if, at the time of application for payment under this act, the principal with respect to any loan upon any such certificate has not been paid in full by the veteran (whether or not the loan has matured), then the Administrator shall (1) pay or discharge such unpaid principal in such amount as is necessary to make the certificate available for payment under this act, (2) deduct the same from the amount of the face value of the certificate, and (3) make payment in an amount equal to the difference between the face value of the certificate and the amount so deducted.

SEC. 2. In the case of each loan heretofore made pursuant to law by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs and/or by any national bank, or any bank or trust company incorporated under the laws of any State, Territory, possession, or the District of Columbia, upon the security of an adjusted-service certificate, any interest that has been or, in consequence of existing law, would be charged against the face value of such certificate either shall be canceled or not so charged, as the case may be, notwithstanding any provision of law to the contrary. Any interest on any such loan payable to any such bank or trust company shall be paid by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs.

In the case of any such loan which is unpaid and held by a bank or trust company at the time of filing an application under this act, the bank or trust company holding the note and certificate shall, upon notice from the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, present them to the Administrator for payment to the bank or trust company in full satisfaction of its claim for the amount of unpaid principal and unpaid interest, except that if the bank or trust company, after such notice, fails to present the certificate and note to the Administrator within 45 days after the mailing of the notice, such interest shall be paid only up to the forty-fifth day after the mailing of such notice.

SEC. 3. (a) An application under this act for payment of a certificate may be made and filed at any time before the maturity of the certificate (1) personally by the veteran, or (2) in case physical or mental incapacity prevents the making or filing of a personal application, then by such representative of the veteran and in such manner as may be by regulations prescribed. An application made by a person other than a representative authorized by such regulations shall be held void.

(b) If the veteran dies after the application is made and before it is filed it may be filed by any person. If the veteran dies after the application is made it shall be valid if the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs finds that it bears the bona fide signature of the applicant, discloses an intention to claim the benefit of this act on behalf of the veteran, and is filed before the maturity of the certificate, whether or not the veteran is alive at the time it is filed. If the death occurs after the application is filed but before the receipt of the payment under this act, or if the application is filed after the death occurs but before mailing of the check in payment to the beneficiary under section 501 of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended, payment shall be made to the estate of the veteran irrespective of any beneficiary designation.

(c) Where the records of the Veterans' Administration show that an application disclosing an intention to claim the benefits of this act has been filed before the maturity of the certificate, and the application cannot be found, such application shall be presumed, in the absence of affirmative evidence to the contrary, to have been valid when originally filed.

(d) In case application under this act for payment of any certificate is filed before April 6, 1937, payment shall be made by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs upon approval of the application. In case application for payment under this act is filed on or after April 6, 1937, payment shall be made on the 1st day of May, September, or January, whichever month first follows the date of filing the application, except that if payment on such application is made to the estate of the veteran pursuant to subsection (b), payment shall be made upon approval of the application.

(e) If at the time this act takes effect a veteran entitled to receive an adjusted-service certificate has not made application therefor, he shall be entitled, upon application made under section 302 of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended, to receive, at his option, under such rules and regulations as the Administrator may prescribe, either the certificate under section 501 of such act, as amended, or payment under this act.

SEC. 4. If an application under this act for payment of the certificate of any veteran is not made prior to maturity of the certificate or is not filed prior to April 6, 1937, interest shall accrue on such certificate at the rate of 3 percent per annum. Such interest shall be computed on a principal amount equal to the face value of the certificate less any indebtedness of the veteran on account of the principal of any loan or loans secured by such certificate. Such interest shall begin to accrue on the day after the date of enactment of this act, or the date of issuance of the certificate, whichever is the later date, and shall continue to accrue until January 1, 1945, death of the veteran, or payment of the certificate upon an application therefor under this act, whichever is the earliest date. The accrued interest shall be paid by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs upon payment of the certificate under this act or the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended.

SEC. 5. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to redeem from the United States Government life-insurance fund all adjusted-service certificates held by that fund on account of loans made thereon, and to pay to the United States Government life-insurance fund the amount of the outstanding liens against such certificates, including all interest due or accrued, together with such amounts as may be due under subdivision (m) of section 502 of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to make such payment by issuing, to the United States Government life-insurance fund, bonds of the United States which shall bear interest at the rate of 4½ percent per annum. No such bonds shall mature or be callable until the expiration of a period of at least 10 years from date of issue, except that any such bond shall be redeemed by the Secretary of the Treasury and the principal and accrued interest thereon paid to the United States Government life-insurance fund at any time upon certification by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs that the amount represented by such bond is required to meet current liabilities. Bonds issued for the purposes of this section shall be issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, subject to the provisions of this section.

SEC. 6. Amounts in the adjusted-service certificate fund are hereby authorized to be appropriated and made immediately available to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs for making payments authorized to be made by this act. The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall from time to time advise the Secretary of the Treasury as to the amount of funds necessary to make such payments.

SEC. 7. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 8. If any provision of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of the act, and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 9. This act may be cited as the "Adjusted Compensation Payment Act, 1936."

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, reserving the opportunity for further discussion of this bill, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to section 7, which reads as follows:

There is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

Mr. President, if this bill should pass the two bodies of the Congress and thereafter should be approved by the President, the veterans would simply have an authorization bill upon the statute books, with not a single penny anywhere available to meet the payment, although the bill recites in its title that it is a bill "to provide for the immediate payment of the World War adjusted-service certificates." As the bill carries no appropriation at this time, I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment to be known as title II to the House bill, which probably will be in the Senate very shortly, and I ask that the amendment as submitted be printed in the RECORD following the text of the House bill, and that the amendment be otherwise printed and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oklahoma? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma was referred to the Committee on Finance, ordered to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma to the bill (H. R. 9870) to provide for the immediate payment of World War adjusted-service certificates, for the cancelation of unpaid interest accrued on loans secured by such certificates, and for other purposes, viz: On page —, after line —, insert:

TITLE II. APPROPRIATION AND FINANCING

SECTION 10. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,225,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay the balance due on the adjusted-service certificates as authorized in section — of this act.

SEC. 11. In order to supplement the amounts in the adjusted-service-certificate fund, which are hereby appropriated and made immediately available to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs for making the payments authorized in this act, the President may, in his discretion, direct the Secretary of the Treasury to use any one or more of the following methods for the purpose of providing funds for making such payments:

(1) The issuance of silver certificates as provided in section 203.

(2) The issuance of United States notes as provided in section 204.

(3) The issuance of bonds of the United States as provided in section 205.

SEC. 12. (a) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to issue additional silver certificates in an amount sufficient to bring the amount of such certificates outstanding up to the full amount of the monetary value of all silver bullion heretofore or hereafter acquired by the United States.

(b) The silver certificates issued pursuant to this section shall be made available to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs in such manner and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, and the certificates so made available shall be used by the Administrator solely for the purpose of making the payments authorized in this act.

SEC. 13. (a) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to issue United States notes in such denominations as he may prescribe against any free and unpledged gold in the Treasury of the United States to the extent that the President directs that such notes be issued for the purpose of making the payments authorized in this act.

(b) The United States notes issued pursuant to this section shall be made available to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs in the same manner and shall be used for the same purpose as the silver certificates issued pursuant to section 12.

SEC. 14. (a) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to issue from time to time bonds of the United States which shall be delivered to the Federal Reserve banks as hereinafter provided. Such bonds shall be payable on or before 20 years from their respective dates of issue, and shall bear interest at a rate per annum to be agreed upon by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Federal Reserve bank to which such bonds are to be delivered, but such rate shall be based upon a reasonable charge for the services to be performed by such bank in connection with the payments authorized in this act. The total amount of such bonds shall not exceed the total amount of such payments that the President directs to be made by the method provided in this section.

(b) Upon the receipt by the Secretary of the Treasury of a statement from the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs containing an estimate of the amount of such payments to be made in any Federal Reserve district, the Secretary shall deliver to the Federal Reserve bank of such district bonds issued pursuant to subsection (a) of a face amount equal to such estimate. Upon the receipt of any such bonds the Federal Reserve bank shall credit to the account of the United States an amount equal to the face amount of the bonds so received and the Secretary of the Treasury shall notify the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs that such credit has been established and the Secretary shall make such credit available to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe. Thereafter such payments within such Federal Reserve district may be made by the Administrator by check drawn against such account. Such estimates may be revised from time to time, and if the amount of bonds so delivered to any Federal Reserve bank shall exceed the amount of the payments required to be made by the method provided in this section in the Federal Reserve district in which such bank is located, bonds in the amount of such excess shall be returned to the Secretary of the Treasury for cancelation.

(c) For the purposes of this section, each Federal Reserve bank is hereby made a special financial agent of the Government.

(d) Bonds issued for the purposes of this section shall be issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, subject to rules and regulations to be promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and subject to the limitations of this section.

(e) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year, beginning with the fiscal year ending July 1, 1937, such amounts as will, within a period of 20 years from the date such bonds are issued, be sufficient to provide for the payment of the principal of such bonds and the interest or service charge thereon as provided in this act. All amounts appropriated for the purposes of such payment shall be set aside in a special fund in the Treasury and shall be allocated and prorated immediately among the several Federal Reserve banks on the basis of the amount of such bonds held by such banks. As soon as practicable after the making of any such allocation, the amount in such fund allocated to each such bank shall be used to pay for the bonds held by such bank, and the bonds so paid for shall be retired and canceled under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the amendment which I propose provides in its first section an appropriation to pay this debt if the authorization bill carries. It provides for a sufficient amount of money being appropriated by the Congress to meet the amount necessary to pay the claim or claims as they are now embodied in the adjusted-service certificates.

Now, as to method of raising the necessary money. The amendment proposes four different ways, and I desire to take just a moment to explain what those four different ways are.

At the present time we have in the adjusted-service-certificate fund approximately $250,000,000. That money has been appropriated from time to time as a sinking fund to pay the certificates when they become due in 1945. On former occasions the Congress has authorized loans to veterans upon their certificates, and the veterans who have secured loans have secured the money from this fund. The Congress has during the past 10 years appropriated more than $1,000,000,000 to go into this fund. The loans have taken most of that money, and, as I have said, there are only about $250,000,000 left.

The second section of my amendment provides that whatever money remains in this fund shall be appropriated to help meet the expense of paying the bonus under whatever form the Congress may agree upon. That will take care of the expenditure to the extent of $250,000,000. It will take something like $2,220,000,000 to pay the bonus if the certificates shall be paid in full and the interest shall not be deducted. According to the terms of the House bill, it will cost approximately $2,220,000,000 to meet this debt. We start out with a fund, already on hand, to the extent of $250,000,000. That leaves approximately $2,000,000,000 that must be raised some way, somehow, sometime, if the veterans are to get their money.

I propose now three other ways to raise this money, and these ways are discretionary with the administration or the President.

Under the terms of the Silver Purchase Act the Treasury Department has purchased in excess of 1,000,000,000 ounces of silver. We have paid for that silver the sum of $580,000,000. That is at the rate of about 57 cents per ounce. Under the law this silver is carried on the Treasury books at its monetary value of $1.29 an ounce.

As I have said, we paid the sum of $580,000,000 for a billion ounces of silver. This billion ounces of silver at its monetary value is worth $1,290,000,000. Under the law the Treasury Department could issue certificates against this silver on the basis of $1.29 an ounce. My amendment authorizes the President to direct the Treasury Department to proceed to issue additional certificates against the silver we now have or the silver we may purchase hereafter at the monetary value of $1.29 an ounce. That would give us approximately $1,290,000,000 more of silver certificates. That provision is not mandatory; it is only discretionary. When I get through, perhaps, the Senate will see my purpose in placing this provision in the amendment.

A third way to raise the money to pay the certificates is this——

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Before the Senator leaves his silver computation, can he tell me whether the sum in the daily Treasury balance of five-hundred-and-eighty-odd million dollars in silver is figured at the $1.29 rate?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It is figured at the cost rate.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is, the cost rate of the silver?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. We have paid that much money for the silver; we paid approximately 57 cents an ounce to obtain approximately 1,010,000,000 ounces of silver—I am using the round figures, a billion ounces of silver—which, at its monetary value, would enable us to issue total certificates to the amount of $1,290,000,000.

Mr. President, 2 days ago we had gold in the Public Treasury in the total sum of $10,139,000,000. That gold is owned by the Treasury. We have allocated some of that gold actually and theoretically as follows: The Federal Reserve banks have outstanding certificates which are, in a sense, receipts for the gold, if we care to make the gold available to the Federal Reserve banks, so that the Federal Reserve banks have a claim on about $5,000,000,000 of this gold. Then the Congress has heretofore appropriated $2,000,000,000 of this gold to go into the stabilization fund. The five billion allocated to the Federal Reserve banks and the two billion allocated to the stabilization fund make a total of seven billion, which leaves in the Public Treasury in excess of $3,000,000,000 of gold free, unhampered, which is serving no useful purpose at the present time.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to a further question?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I notice from the Treasury statement that the exchange stabilization fund is listed at $1,800,000,000. Would that indicate that the fund has lost $200,000,000?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. No; the Congress made available $2,000,000,000 to the Treasury, but up to the present time the Treasury has used only $200,000,000 of the amount. It can still use $1,800,000,000 if it sees fit. So far as I know, that $1,800,000,000 has not been called upon; it is there, free, and not allocated for whatever claims or claim the stabilization fund may be called upon to meet. My amendment, in its third provision, authorizes the President to direct the Treasury to issue some form of gold currency against a sufficient amount of this surplus gold to make up the difference between what is in the present adjusted-service-certificate fund and what may be represented by silver certificates and the total amount required. It will take approximately $1,250,000,000 to make up the deficiency. We have the gold not being used. However, the provision is not directory but only discretionary.

That brings me to the main part of the amendment. The amendment then authorizes the President and the Treasury Department to issue United States bonds to the full amount required to meet the payments due and to place such bonds in the different Federal Reserve banks, placing in the Chicago banks enough bonds to pay the veterans residing in the Chicago district; placing in the Kansas City Federal Reserve Bank enough of those bonds at their face to pay the soldiers residing in the Kansas City Federal Reserve district, and sufficient to provide for the requirements throughout the other 10 districts. These bonds would be in regular form, and would be placed in the banks as Senators would give a note to the bank if they should borrow money as security for the loan. Under my amendment these bonds would be placed in the banks, not sold to the banks, and would not be placed there on an interest rate but on a service charge. That service charge might be comparable to a call rate. Borrowing on the money call rate from day to day is the cheapest possible way to raise funds. The call rate today is at present three-fourths of 1 percent. We can place those bonds in the 12 Federal Reserve banks upon a contract, and the 12 Federal Reserve banks can get the call rate from day to day. That is the cheapest possible way to raise money for any purpose; and that is provided for by my amendment.

We have appropriated $112,000,000 a year to go into this fund for maturing certificates when they are due in 1945. Under the terms of my amendment we can bring that down to $100,000,000 a year and save $12,000,000 a year in the appropriation item. In 20 years that would be $240,000,000. Then for the service charge in the first year we would appropriate $100,000,000, and the Treasury Department would be authorized to take the $100,000,000 and divide it into 12 parts in proportion to the bonds held by the 12 banks and retire that number of bonds—a hundred million dollars' worth a year—so that in 20 years the bonds would be retired. The first year we would have, of course, to pay a service charge on the entire $2,000,000,000. The second year we would have to pay a service charge on only $1,900,000,000; after 18 years on only $200,000,000, and in 19 years only $100,000,000 would be left subject to the service charge of three-fourths of 1 percent. It might be lower or it might be higher, but whatever it might be it would be the lowest possible rate for which money could be borrowed at any place in these United States.

I would not ask that this method be adopted by the Congress if the money were to be used for profitable commercial enterprises. If the Government were going to lend this money for people to make money on it, it would not be fair to ask the Federal Reserve banks to loan the Government the money at a call rate or on a service charge of three-quarters of 1 percent and then in turn loan it out at 4 or 5 percent. This is a patriotic debt and has to be paid. The Federal Reserve banks have all the bonds they need to pay their expenses, drawing the regular rate of interest, which is a fairly good income for the Federal Reserve banks.

If this plan should be adopted, the President would have these different ways for raising the money. I think he probably would take the bond method. He could call in the officials of the Federal Reserve banks and say, "I am authorized to raise $2,000,000,000. I could raise it by issuing certificates against the silver or by issuing certificates against the gold, or I can do it by issuing bonds and placing those bonds in your banks on a call rate, or a service charge which is comparable. I want to issue the bonds." But if the banks are unwilling to issue bonds on this basis there is provided in the amendment the power for the President to issue the money.

Mr. President, I simply make this statement in order that the Senate may understand what is the purpose of the amendment. The amendment is now being considered by a responsible authority for the Federal Government and I shall be governed very largely by their verdict after study shall have been made.

In connection with my remarks I ask permission to have printed at the end thereof a statement which I made in New York City last night.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is now 30 minutes until 10 o'clock. Promptly at 10 o'clock, from the banquet room in the Mayflower Hotel in Washington, you will hear our great President, and likewise the next President of the United States, Franklin D. Roosevelt. Having no information as to the nature of the address of the President, I will use my allotted time in presenting a sort of background for his address which is to follow.

Today is Jackson Day. Throughout America and the world, on land and sea, millions are now assembled at thousands of dinners and in special meetings to do honor to the memory of one of the patron saints of democracy, Andrew Jackson, of Tennessee.

Who was Andrew Jackson?

Why do we celebrate this day?

Jackson was born on the 15th day of March 1767; hence we are not celebrating the anniversary of his birth.

Let me give you a few of the high lights of Jackson's life:

He was born in the backwoods of South Carolina. At the age of 15 years, with an only brother, he joined the armed forces of the Colonies. His brother was killed in action, and at that tender age, without father or mother, brother or sister, or even a near relative, Andrew Jackson was forced to face western pioneer life alone.

Inspired by ambition, overflowing with energy, and led on by an indomitable will, he went West to lead in the development of one of the great States of the American Union.

Jackson studied law; was a delegate to the Constitutional Convention of Tennessee; he was in turn Tennessee's first Congressman, a United States Senator, and a justice of the supreme court of his State. When Jackson was Senator, Thomas Jefferson was the Vice President and Presiding Officer of the United States Senate.

In addition to the foregoing, he was a successful planter, stock raiser, and farmer.

But this was not all of Jackson's many-sided life. As a major general of militia he waged war against the Indian tribes of Tennessee, Florida, and the South. He was a Territorial Governor of Florida, declined the post of Minister to Mexico, and served as a United States Senator a second time.

Andrew Jackson was commissioned a major general in the Regular Army; and in command of the southern forces, on January 8, 1815, he decisively defeated the British at New Orleans. Today is the one hundred and twenty-first anniversary of Jackson's victory over Pakenham at New Orleans. Jackson the man, his victory, and his many seemingly impossible accomplishments form the basis of our celebration today.

Great as was his triumph at New Orleans, it was only one of the great events in the crowded life of the hero of the Hermitage. Because of his activities and successes, the fame of Jackson spread among the people. He was hailed as "Old Hickory", the "Iron Warrior."

He soon became the people's candidate for President. In 1824, as the candidate of the masses, he won the popular vote for President. In that election no candidate received a majority of the electors, hence the contest was thrown into the House of Representatives, and Jackson lost to John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts.

In 1828 political parties took definite shape. The first Democratic National Convention was held at Baltimore. No platform was prepared, but the convention adopted the rule "that two-thirds of the whole number of the votes in the convention shall be necessary to constitute a choice." In such convention and under such a rule Andrew Jackson was nominated as the first regular Democratic candidate for President. In the election which followed Jackson won over John Quincy Adams by an electoral vote of 178 to 83, and thereby became the seventh President of the United States.

In such election Jackson carried the great States of Pennsylvania and New York. In 1832 he was reelected and served to March 4, 1837; hence, 100 years ago tonight Andrew Jackson sat in the White House at Washington, the President of the people's Government in the hands of the people.

At the end of his Presidential term, Jackson, although worn and gray, named and elected his successor. As he left the White House great cheering masses lined the streets. Crowds surrounded and followed his carriage as he started to his beloved home in Tennessee.

How different from the leave taking of the last President of the United States.

Andrew Jackson entered public life opposed by the special interests but supported by the masses of the people. Jackson learned early in his political career that greedy, concentrated wealth makes the noise but that the people do the voting.

As President, what did Jackson do?

If Jackson had been President the last 3 years, what would he have done? If he were President today, what would he do?

We know what Jackson did 100 years ago. His record made and left, now growing brighter with the years, is the agenda of what he would do were he serving us today.

Conditions of the immediate past and even of the present have been and are in many ways duplicates of the issues and events of 100 years ago. Democratic principles had been asserted by Thomas Jefferson, but Andrew Jackson organized the Democratic Party and placed the Jeffersonian principles into effect.

Formerly Presidents had been selected by political caucuses at the Capital, but now thousands of average citizens, including the poor residing in the interior, were enfranchised and dominated and controlled the machinery of the Government. On the one side were the Clays, the Calhouns, and the Websters, and on the other side was Andrew Jackson and the masses of the people.

In his campaigns Jackson was opposed by the newspapers, the manufacturers, and the bankers. His political enemies asserted that he was the leader of the "mob" and that the "mob" must not be given control of government. The defeated group regarded Jackson as the extreme radical of his day.

What of the record which he made?

Hard times were known in Jackson's day, and he had his experience with a panic. He defeated his depression by making money plentiful and credits easy. As the result of his policies, labor was employed at high wages. Buying power was restored to the planter and the producer, and labor and industry flourished.

His domestic policies were successful, and his foreign policies were brilliant. Foreign nations were made to play and pay.

Jackson was a positive and determined character. He demanded nothing but what was right and submitted to nothing that was wrong. He made the American flag respected at home and abroad.

Confidence in Jackson and his administration developed, prosperity returned, and soon the Public Treasury was overflowing with money.

Elected by the masses from the South and West, before his term expired he was respected and admired in the North and East. He made a triumphal voyage to New England, and there was given the degree of doctor of laws by Harvard University.

After 8 years of Democratic government, Andrew Jackson had his people prosperous and happy and the United States at peace with the world.

Relative to the great issues pending before our people today, were Jackson President, what policies would he pursue? What would he do about preparedness for our national defense? Jackson favored an adequate army and navy. In his farewell address he said: "We shall more certainly preserve peace when it is understood that we are prepared for war."

The United States form the greatest, strongest, and richest Nation in the world, and Jackson would see that our national defense is ample to protect our people and our property on land and sea throughout the world.

What would Jackson do about the control and regulation of industry?

When he became convinced that the United States bank was injurious to the public interest, he destroyed the bank. Were he President today, he would either protect the people against monopolistic oppression or he would destroy the monopolies.

Down at Washington our political enemies contend that the entire New Deal is unconstitutional. It is true that some of our temporary and emergency measures have been held void by the Supreme Court of the United States.

We passed an act seeking to aid the small independent oil operators of the country, and the larger companies, wishing to continue and strengthen their existing monopoly, attacked the law, and a divided Court sustained their contention.

We passed an act seeking to protect the farmers against foreclosures at a time when they could neither refinance nor meet their maturing obligations. The law was attacked, and the Supreme Court held the act unconstitutional.

We passed a law seeking to divide such work and labor as was demanded among as many workers as possible to the end that hours might be shortened, wages might be raised, and distress might be relieved. The law was attacked in the courts and was held in violation of the Constitution.

We passed a law seeking to increase the purchasing power of the farmers. Two days ago this act was likewise held to be void.

Andrew Jackson had the same troubles 100 years ago. On one occasion, after an adverse ruling by the Court, Jackson said, "Now that the Supreme Court has ruled, let it enforce its decision."

Not all the New Deal laws have been attacked, and not all of those attacked have been held void.

The money-adjustment amendment introduced by myself was likewise assailed, but the Supreme Court sustained the act. The law referred to provided for the devaluation of the dollar. President Roosevelt acted under the law and reduced the size and weight of the gold dollar 40 percent. This act has had the effect of cheapening the dollar. To the extent that the dollar has been cheapened prices have been increased, and in proportion that the general price level has been raised prosperity has returned.

High-value dollars and consequent low prices never fail to bring on panics and depressions. Low-value dollars and resultant high prices have never failed to bring about activity, progress, and prosperity.

Andrew Jackson had his monetary troubles. He became involved in a controversy over an extension of the charter of the Bank of the United States. Jackson contended that the bank was interfering with legitimate business; that the bank was perniciously active in politics, and that the act creating the bank was unconstitutional. He opposed the extension of the bank's charter, and in fact his opposition destroyed the bank.

The Jackson panic was something like the Hoover depression. Both were caused by the high-valued dollars and low prices.

Jackson acted. In addition to destroying the bank he had his Congress reduce the gold content of the dollar. With the gold dollar reduced in weight and value, with plenty of money in circulation, with higher prices and purchasing power restored, labor was employed, industry flourished, prosperity returned, and Jackson ended his term with the people busy, prosperous, and happy, and the Federal Treasury overflowing with revenue.

Again, how different from the ending of the term of the last President of the United States.

President Roosevelt has followed and is following the Jackson precedent. He has reduced the gold content of the dollar, and the dollar has been cheapened.

Through a wider use of silver, the actual money in circulation has been increased some $500,000,000. The upturn in business and the upturning prosperity are due in the main to the monetary adjustment policy of President Franklin D. Roosevelt.

If time will permit, I shall outline briefly the causes of our legal troubles in Washington.

When Governor Roosevelt was inaugurated President on March 4, 1933, the Hoover panic was almost 4 years old. Business was at a standstill. Millions were hungry, cold, and homeless, and something had to be done.

Without precedents, President Roosevelt attacked the problem. As in times of panic, conflagration, and pestilence, laws were of necessity hurriedly passed. In such times, with the Capital surrounded by thousands of hungry, idle, and almost naked men, it is not to be wondered at that laws were rushed through Congress in order to provide relief.

In passing, let me remind you what kind of relief measures passed during President Hoover's administration.

The first measure passed was one granting a rebate and refund of $160,000,000 to the big income-tax payers of the country.

The second relief measure recommended by President Hoover was the creation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, to loan public money to the banks, trust companies, life-insurance companies, and the railways of the country.

These acts typify the Hoover plan for relief.

Had Andrew Jackson been President from 1929 to 1933, he would have provided relief, but he would have started with the hungry, sick, and naked instead of shoveling out public money to the banks, railroads, and to the captains of industry.

The Supreme Court at Washington is making history. The Constitution is being more thoroughly and minutely considered. The powers of the Congress are being defined. If the decisions rendered and the precedents set are hereafter adhered to, then a mass of our statute law, if and when attacked, will be held to be invalid.

In the past the Congress has enacted many laws creating agencies, boards, and commissions and authorizing such agencies to promulgate rules and regulations carrying into effect the policies adopted.

Many of these laws are in force only and for the simple reason that they have not suffered court attack.

In recent decisions, typified by the case of Panama Refining Co. against Ryan and the Schechter poultry case, the Supreme Court has held "that the Congress is not permitted to abdicate or to transfer to others the essential legislative functions with which it is vested."

"The principle", says the Court, "forbidding Congress to abdicate or to transfer to others the essential legislative functions with which it is vested by the Constitution has been recognized by the Court in every case in which the question has been raised."

The Constitution provides that "the Congress shall have power to coin money and to regulate the value thereof."

Congress has delegated this power without laying down a policy as to the amount of money to be coined or establishing a standard as to the value of the dollar.

This question no doubt will be very soon raised, and unless the Court reverses its present position it may be that the most important features of the Federal Reserve System will be held to be invalid.

Under the Constitution and our form of government the people have the constitutional right and the constitutional power to rule and govern themselves.

While Thomas Jefferson created the Democratic Party, it remained for Andrew Jackson to organize the party and to place the people and the people's representatives in control of the Government. The ever-present issue of what group shall control the Government is with us today. In the contest now before us the issue is special interest against public interest.

President Roosevelt is serving and protecting the public interest and the masses of our people in their right to the pursuit of happiness, prosperity, and security.

Monopoly having been first served at the Public Treasury by President Hoover, and having had second helpings by our administration, is now seeking to deny to the masses even the crumbs that may fall from monopoly's table.

As Jackson over 100 years ago held the fort at New Orleans and protected the people of the South from British invasion, so will President Roosevelt hold the White House and protect the people of America from monopolistic invasion.

REFERENCE OF HOUSE MESSAGES

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I desire to submit a request, and I ask the attention of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY]. I ask unanimous consent that during the adjournment of the Senate following today messages from the House may be received and appropriately referred by the Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

JOINT RESOLUTIONS RECOMMITTED

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there have been referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, Senate Joint Resolution No. 133, for designation of a street to be known as Missouri Avenue, and House Joint Resolution No. 280, for the designation of a street or avenue in the Mall to be known as Maine Avenue.

They have been favorably reported and are on the calendar.

This morning, in the further consideration of these measures, the committee suggested that they be recommitted for further action by the committee. I therefore move that those two joint resolutions be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah that the joint resolutions referred to by him be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

CONFEDERATED BANDS OF UTE INDIANS

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on Senate bill 381.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 381) for the relief of the Confederated Bands of Ute Indians located in Utah, Colorado, and New Mexico.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint conferees on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. McNARY. I inquire what is the nature of the motion. I did not understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma moves that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House to Senate bill 381, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

Mr. McNARY. I understand the amendments of the House have been messaged over to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate bill passed the House with amendments, which have been sent to the Senate. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma, Mr. BULOW, and Mr. FRAZIER conferees on the part of the Senate.

ANNA HATHAWAY

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 430) for the relief of Anna Hathaway, which was, on page 1, lines 8 and 9, to strike out "employee of the Postal Service, who now resides at Willard, N. Mex.," and insert "postmaster at Willard, N. Mex., who is alleged to have sustained disability on or about October 16, 1928, while in the performance of his duties, subsequently resulting in his death."

Mr. HATCH. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE FOR AERONAUTICS

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

Pursuant to the act of March 3, 1915, which established the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, I submit herewith the annual report of that Committee for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1935.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 9, 1936.

[NOTE.—Report accompanied similar message to the House of Representatives.]

REPORT ON EMERGENCY RELIEF FUNDS

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I have the honor to transmit herewith, in accordance with the provisions of section 15 of the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935, a report of the operations under such joint resolution, consisting of an itemized statement regarding funds appropriated under the act, prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury, and of a statement prepared by the Acting Director of the National Emergency Council. Pursuant to the act, such report includes a statement of the expenditures made and obligations incurred, by classes and amounts.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 9, 1936.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER, as in executive session, laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock noon, Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 13, 1936, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JANUARY 9, 1936

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art the Ancient of Days, at Thy footstool we humbly bow. We praise Thee, for Thou art the Eternal Word, through whom all things hold together and in whom divine majesty and power are incarnate. Father, we ask for a vision of Him that we may feel our unworthiness and be moved to make a deeper consecration to our sacred trust. O God of might, flow through our human weakness that the trials and tests of life may lead us through discipline to a destiny with its glorious dawn. Deliver us from worry, and may Thy peace guard our hearts and minds. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including a statement about the recent Supreme Court ruling by Mr. Raymond Clapper, of the Daily News, which appeared in the News of Tuesday, January 7.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by including the statement referred to. Is there objection?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

THE SUPREME COURT'S DECISION AND THE A. A. A.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, Tuesday, January 7, 1936, will be a day long to be remembered by agriculturists of this great Nation of ours as it was on this day the Supreme Court of the United States, by a vote of 6 to 3, found the A. A. A. unconstitutional just when the farmers were commencing to see the light of day, paying their debts, buying new machinery, and were looking to the future with a confidence and hope that the depression had passed and the American people had turned the corner and were looking forward to better times.

Those who believe that the American farmer is going to stand idly by and watch his program for economic equality and parity for which he has fought more than a decade swept into the discard will be badly mistaken. The fight is on and this time all gloves are off.

The overthrow of the A. A. A., together with the decisions handed down against the N. R. A. and the Frazier-Lemke Acts, have been serious blows against the efforts of the Roosevelt administration and this Congress to accelerate recovery in this country; and the decisions have done more than anything else to retard recovery, with the A. A. A. the most serious of them all. I feel that the adverse effect which the decision of the A. A. A. will have on our economic and agricultural life will be felt for a long, long time.

The program launched by organized agriculture must go forward. The American farmer will continue to fight for economic parity. Under the operations of the Agricultural Adjustment Act the agricultural march toward parity by giving farmers a purchasing power has stimulated business revival throughout the country. Certainly, if industry is protected by a protective tariff, then agriculture is entitled to protection. If industry is to receive aid from the Federal Government, then, I believe, that agriculture, which I consider the basic industry of this Nation, needs some kind of protection; and laws should be passed provisioned to aid this most vital part of our industrial life.

Since the Supreme Court declared unconstitutional the A. A. A. I have received many letters and telegrams from people of all walks of life from my district and the Middle West protesting the action of the high Court.

I have cataloged the letters and telegrams and find that not only farmers are raising their arms in protest but the merchant in the cities, the workers in the mills and plants, the bankers, and other mercantile workers who earn their daily bread far removed from the farms are crying aloud at the action of the Supreme Court.

While I do not want to appear hasty in my opinion of the ruling, yet I do not hesitate to say that from the tone of the messages which I have received that these citizens feel that a stunning blow has been dealt the national economic recovery.

I am sure that this Congress will take specific steps to provide legislation, the mechanism by which agricultural parity is to be continued. I believe that it is up to the Members of this Congress to provide that legislation within the provisions of the Constitution with as little delay as possible.

I say that if the Constitution in its present form makes it impossible for all groups to enjoy economic equality, steps should be taken to immediately amend the Constitution so that the rights of all groups and of all citizens in this great country of ours will no longer be jeopardized.

The day of special privilege for certain groups is over. The laws of this country must protect equally all groups and all classes showing no favoritism regardless of color, creed, or nationality. The A. A. A., which has just been declared invalid, is the farmers' own program. It was written by the farmers, and by no one else, as it was known in the beginning that those who tilled the soil knew best the problems of the farmers.

I say without hesitation that those who attacked this farm program in the preliminary hearings before congressional committees, and in suits against the Department of Agriculture and the A. A. A., are enemies of this country. Because of their selfish attitude and their un-American spirit they have left no stone unturned to keep the farmer impoverished, to reduce him to a state of peasantry, and to retard the whole program of national economic recovery advocated by our President.

And what has been the result? The farm problem is with us again. We are right back where we started from. The puzzle with which every administration has wrestled since the dark days of the World War is now as unsolved as it was when it first appeared in the crash of prices that followed the close of the war. The prices of farm products may stay steady or even rise for a while, or there may be a sudden drop in prices. If they drop, the problem becomes acute. If they rise or stay steady, that will mean eventually an increased and uncontrolled acreage, and hence the "surplus" seat of the infection that has caused economic sickness to some 45,000,000 of our population directly and a malady to the rest of the Nation because of the farmer's inability to buy what the industries of the cities produce.

I predict that there will be cheers for a while from the Republican side of the fence, as the decision handed down by that august body will first be seen in the light of its effect on the coming campaign. But those cheers will soon die down. For this problem is not the exclusive property of any one political party. It is broader than that and longer than 1936. It is the same thorn that afflicted Harding, pricked Coolidge, bewildered Hoover. The sum total of the Supreme Court majority decision is that the farm problem is a State and not a National one. I personally like the comment of Justice Stone of the minority as to this exercise of judicial power:

> For the removal of unwise laws from the statute books, appeal lies not to the courts but to the ballot and to the processes of democratic government * * * courts are not the only agency of government that must be assumed to have capacity to govern. * * * Interpretation of our great charter * * * which proceeds on any assumption that the responsibility for the preservation of our institutions is the exclusive concern of any one of the three branches of Government, or that it alone can save them from destruction, is far more likely, in the long run, "to obliterate the constituent members" of "an indestructible Union of indestructible States" than the rank recognition that language, even of a Constitution, may mean what it says: that the power to tax and spend includes the power to relieve a Nation-wide economic maladjustment. * * *

After all, that was the interpretation of the minority. In court affairs, the majority rules. So the situation as it now stands is that the A. A. A. is out, and the farm problem is in again. What is to be done now. It is too early to say. First, I believe an attempt should be made to make a law that will fit the views of the Supreme Court judges. If that fails, then there is just one other route. If it must be handled, as it is evident it must be, as a national one, that route is a constitutional amendment. Should that finally prove necessary, I believe that all parties in Congress will join in support.

Whether or not the majority of the Members here today believe as I do, there is one thing that I am sure of. I believe that such national recovery as we have experienced since Mr. Roosevelt took office is in large part due to the improvement of agricultural conditions and that such improvement in agricultural conditions is largely due to the A. A. A. and its administration.

I feel that a vast majority of farmers, and also that a majority of my colleagues, hold to the same convictions, and that whatever is necessary to cure any defects in the act pointed out by the Supreme Court will have immediate attention of the farm leaders and the Members of this Congress.

Yes, my friends, the fight is on, and the days that are ahead are most important not only for the farmers but for the people of other walks of life.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including a letter which I received this morning from the Army and Navy Union of America, expressing the views of that organization respecting pending legislation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PITFALLS OF NEUTRALITY LEGISLATION

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD a radio address which I shall deliver this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, through courtesy of the National Broadcasting Co., I spoke over its Nation-wide network from the United States Capitol on the subject, Pitfalls of Neutrality Legislation. My address was as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, I agree with my distinguished precedessor on this program, Mrs. ROGERS, that the most important subject immediately before Congress from the standpoint of our country's vital interests is neutrality legislation. In a world of turmoil if we are to escape the hooks that are reaching out from many directions to drag us into the maelstrom of strife, we must speedily enact legislation that will establish America's neutral position beyond equivocation or dispute.

Fate has put up to the Congress of the United States at this particular time a task of tremendous meaning and magnitude—the task of writing a permanent neutrality law. It is imperative for the future of America that this task shall be performed with completeness and finality; that when the legislative product is brought forward for world inspection it will be recognized by all the nations on earth as answering the requirements of real neutrality; that whosoever reads it will know that nothing needs to be added or subtracted, and that as it stands it is a perfect legislative act to protect America's neutral position in a warring world.

The danger is that we shall discharge our duty only partially. The danger is that powerful economic and selfish interests will halt us short of a real performance. Many of these influences are now at work, subtly and with Machiavellian cleverness seeking to create the impression from the platform and through the press that we must "go slow" in enacting permanent neutrality legislation, lest it may interfere too much with our foreign trade. Just as if dollars and cents should be weighed in the same scales with the lives of our precious young men!

Our country wants to stay out of war. It wants us to shield our young men from the bloodletting that periodically reddens vast foreign areas with the life stream of the human race. It is looking to us to pass legislation that will keep our boys out of the world's slaughter pens, and it will not have patience or forgiveness for any halfway milk-and-water performance. I say shame on all of the crew of selfish interests who for the sake of filthy dollars would wreck our prospects of securing real neutrality legislation. To those whose imagination does not arise above such base considerations let me make this statement:

One of our fine American boys, your son or my son or somebody else's son, is worth more than all of the wealth of the world combined.

A brief review of our foreign-trade statistics shows how sordid and puerile is the argument that our foreign trade must be allowed to interfere with a proper determination of this neutrality question, which is so intimately interwoven with the tragic problems of life and death, misery and happiness of our people. America, of all nations on earth, is most nearly self-sufficient. Our total exports to Italy, everything included, are only twenty-three hundredths of 1 percent of the total value of our products, according to the latest figures of the Department of Commerce. Our trade with all the world amounts to only 7.5 percent of the estimated total value of all movable goods produced in this country, according to the same authority. It is impossible to imagine a situation where a complete embargo on goods to all of the foreign nations that conceivably might be at war at one time would amount to more than a tiny fraction of the cost in dollars and cents of the World War, or to more than a mere bagatelle compared with the astounding cost and the inevitable loss of life that would result if we should allow cupidity for profits to snare us into another such war. The actual direct cost of the World War up to date, as shown by Treasury Department records, is $41,765,000,000, or the equivalent of $60,000 for every day since Christ was born, and that does not take into account future pension lists, veterans' hospitalization, and other left-over expenses.

President Coolidge probably was not far wrong when he said that the World War will ultimately cost America $100,000,000,000. The total foreign trade of the United States in 1934, the last year for which statistics are available, was $2,100,000,000. Thus it will be seen that if the entire foreign trade of the United States, including all exports of every kind and description, were entirely cut off for 47 years, the loss to the United States would still be less than our part of the financial cost of the World War, based on Mr. Coolidge's forecast, to say nothing of the heart-sickening toll of lives and the terrible burden of grief and misery caused by that war. Therefore from every standpoint, economic as well as humanitarian, there is a genuine obligation resting upon us to write into the statutes a real neutrality law with teeth in it.

With neutrality legislation right at our threshold there is a conflict between sharply contradictory principles—that is to say, between discretionary neutrality legislation and mandatory neutrality legislation. The State Department is the leading protagonist of discretionary legislation and its prophet is Hon. SAM D. MCREYNOLDS, chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, while the champions of mandatory legislation are Senators GERALD NYE and BENNETT CLARK and Representative MAURY MAVERICK. The State Department's proposal has been introduced in the House by Judge MCREYNOLDS and is known as House Joint Resolution 422. The Nye-Clark proposal has been introduced in identical form at the opposite end of the Capitol, being known as Senate bill 3478 and House bill 9668.

The asperity of the conflict between these two principles has been somewhat softened by mutual concessions, so that the McReynolds bill is not nearly as discretionary as in the original draft and the Nye-Clark bill is not as mandatory as it was formerly. The first contention of sponsors of the State Department bill was that the President should have carte blanche discretion in declaring and withholding embargoes, defining "aggressor" nations, and so forth, while those of the opposite school insisted that the President should have no discretion at all, but that America's neutrality policy should be based solely on definite law.

While so far there has not been a coalescing of the two elements, my personal opinion as of one who has given considerable thought to neutrality legislation, is that the entente cordiale that has grown up between the two schools bodes no good as it is likely to result in an agreement that will land us too far away from the goal of fixed and definite mandatory neutrality. Both schools for instance are now in agreement on the quota system of regulating exports of goods to warring nations—that is to say, normal quotas of shipments are to be allowed in respect to goods that do not come under the head of munitions and implements of war.

I think it would be a great mistake to allow normal quotas of exports to nations at war, and I have introduced a bill (H. R. 9492), the opening paragraph of which reads as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That upon the outbreak of war between two or more foreign nations the President shall issue a proclamation forbidding (1) exports of all kinds and (2) loans and credits to said belligerent countries or to the nationals of said belligerent countries. Said prohibition shall be made effective in a similar way by proclamation against nations that may enter the war subsequent to its outbreak and the nationals of said nations."

With others who are earnestly interested in this subject, I have given much thought to the proposal to hold our trade and loans to normal quotas after war breaks out, but it will not work. Suppose, for instance, that a foreign nation in peacetime receives a million barrels of oil from the United States for domestic peacetime requirements in its industries. If that nation goes to war and we continue to send to it 1,000,000 barrels of oil per annum, that oil will not go into peaceful uses. It will, of course, be seized by the government for war purposes, and to that extent we shall be aiding that government to prosecute its war, which would make us in fact unneutral, although on the face of things we might still appear neutral. I only cite oil as an example. The same facts would apply to practically all other articles that enter into international commerce, for there is hardly any article that may not be diverted to war uses.

The language of the existing weak neutrality law, confining embargoes to "munitions and implements of war", is a gruesome joke. Foodstuffs, oil, cotton, copper, and a variety of raw materials are just as essential to a nation bent on waging war as are the shipments which are narrowly described in our present abortive neutrality statute as "munitions." All of these things must be banned if we are to be truly neutral.

There is but one way to be neutral, and that is to be neutral. We cannot be both neutral and accessory to war at the same time. The only way to protect America's neutral position in the world is to cut off all trade and all financial transactions with warring nations.

It is obvious that much persuasion will be brought to bear on Members of Congress to aline them in support of the discretionary provisions liberally sprinkled through the State Department's bill, which even in their amended form would give to every future President great authority in levying and lifting embargoes, in choosing nations to be penalized and those not to be penalized, in deciding what exports shall be banned and what exports shall be allowed, etc. I have the utmost respect for President Roosevelt. He is a peace-loving President, thank the Lord, but sometime in the future we may have a militaristic President in the White House, and then the exercise of such powers will be fraught with the gravest dangers.

We should not take any such chances. We should remove in advance all doubt as to what America will do, and this we can easily accomplish by passing a mandatory neutrality law of broad scope and definite provisions, leaving nothing to the future or to imagination or to chance.

We can then say to every nation on earth: "This is the law. Read it and you will know exactly what America will do."

This is the frank, honest, aboveboard way of dealing with the question of neutrality. It gets rid of secret, tricky diplomacy that has brought many governments to the brink of ruin. It is the way that offers to America the greatest measure of insurance against world involvement. It is the way of peace and tranquillity.

If we are to give to every future President authority to juggle with these serious and delicate international situations, then, of course, we must expect that every President will have his agents abroad mixing in the affairs of foreign lands so as to keep him advised when to strike and when not to strike, and soon we shall have a trouble squad intermeddling with world problems that will utterly belie the sound advice given by the Father of his Country in respect to foreign involvements. Congress, if it be true to America, will not permit such tinkering and experimentation with world nerve centers when the possibility—nay, the virtual certainty—is that it will bring tragic involvements in world strife.

We Members of Congress who sit in judgment on the text of a permanent neutrality law must remember that we are the guardians of posterity. Upon the faithfulness of our performance, as measured by the Republic's traditional ideals of friendliness and service, rests in no small degree the future peace of America. In the momentous hour when we shall vote on this bill we must not be faithless to Washington, who left to the Nation which he founded a legacy of priceless value when he admonished us in his Farewell Address to keep free from foreign entanglements.

SHARE THE WEALTH

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including a speech which I delivered in my home town.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, as an extension of my remarks, I include an address which I made to the Kiwanis Club of Birmingham, Ala., on November 5, 1935, as follows:

A few weeks ago a prominent Federal official, speaking in this chamber and to this organization, defined the New Deal as a movement for the redistribution of wealth. He stated that the issue was between the "haves" and the "have nots." Such a statement from such a prominent source should not pass unnoticed.

To impute such doctrine to the President is to impeach his loyalty to the platform on which he was elected and to the principles of the party of which he is the leader. The Democratic Party has always been a party of extreme individualism. It has been highly individualistic, not only on matters of liberty and personal right but on matters relating to economics and property rights. Thomas Jefferson held that "that people is governed best which is governed least." The right of a man to order his own life and to do as he chooses with his own property is a Democratic fundamental. An examination of party platforms discloses few departures from this principle in nearly 100 years. I am bound, therefore, to reject all implications that the President holds to any such political philosophy.

I will not attempt to define the New Deal nor to expound its philosophy. It would be presumptuous to do so. However, I decline to accept the definition which was given. I decline to believe that the New Deal is committed to principles which clearly violate American fundamentals and the Constitution of the United States.

During the recent lean years men have been thinking and talking more about economics than ever before. Men who never before had given such matters a thought have been thinking and talking about the problems heretofore given over to the economists. Some of this thinking is of value, but much of it is badly muddled. Much of the talk has merely added to the confusion.

Out of our stress and difficulty have arisen new prophets who assume to point the way out. Most of them are concerned with reforms which have no relation to recovery. Much of their advice is essentially unsound and harmful.

Many of these new false leaders are sincere fanatics who, in this time of suffering and doubt, are moved to risk the fate of the world on half-baked theories—others are idealists who, having caught a glimpse of heaven, forget that we live in a practical world and have faulty human nature to deal with. Some of the false leaders are demagogues who are trading on misery and seek to capitalize on the confusion of the times. There also are those who have lost their all, and now having turned "defeatists", are ready to surrender our traditions and to engage in reckless experiments as a way out.

Some of the false prophets are harmless—others are extremely dangerous. Among the most dangerous are those who advocate schemes for the redistribution of existing wealth on the basis of an equal share for all. They are even more dangerous than the Fascists, Socialists, and Communists, for these collectivists have consistent principles, whereas the "redistributors of wealth" have no system, but are moved by sentimentality and half-baked idealism. Their demand is not for equality of opportunity to labor and to receive just rewards for their efforts. They demand equality in the enjoyment of existing wealth. Apparently they are not interested in equality in opportunity for creating new wealth.

Proposals for the redistribution of wealth usually take the form of taking property into the Public Treasury through confiscatory taxation and then redistributing it in the form of pensions or other gratuities. The implication is that only the rich will be taxed, and that the average citizen will escape. But let no man assume that he will be able to escape merely because the levy does not fall directly upon him. Every citizen will have to make his contribution, indirect though it may be. In this respect the levy is not unlike other taxes. All taxes are bad—all fall upon the whole people, either directly or indirectly. All have a bearing upon the standard of living of every consumer.

The proposal is to take the wealth which has been accumulated. It is not aimed at the prevention of accumulation or at unfair methods by which accumulation is made. Men are to be allowed to continue the exaction of unjust profits if they are able to do so. It is proposed to seize these profits after they are made, then to hand them over to the class considered as deserving. It has never occurred to its advocates to demand the free play of economic laws so that extortionate profits could not be exacted. This would leave the funds in the hands of those to whom they rightfully belonged at the beginning.

With the ideal of equality of opportunity every thoughtful man must be in full accord. The future of civilization depends upon the solution of the problem presented by the injustices arising under the existing system. These injustices are not inherent in the system and are no proper part of it. They are the result of privilege and special advantage. They are the result of abuses of the system and are cankers and sores upon it. The real remedy is to cure the abuses—to restore the system to a healthy condition, not to destroy it merely because it has been abused. Why should we burn the house merely to rid it of the vermin? The remedy is to secure equality of opportunity, and not to try to place energy and worthiness upon a dead level with thriftlessness, laziness, and improvidence. The world cannot go forward that way. Progress requires the initiative and labor which cannot be had unless man is permitted to enjoy the fruits of his own achievements.

The proper business of government is to protect the citizen in the enjoyment of his rights, and in the equality of opportunity to work and to create, free from oppression and wrong. No man should be allowed to use his wealth to oppress others—no man should be allowed to acquire wealth through special favors and privileges. Just governments do not permit such wrongs.

But government may not properly concern itself with natural inequalities. Given a sound mind and a sound body, man should be left to his own resources. Government should secure equality of opportunity. This done, it should not concern itself with the results. Man must be held to his own due responsibility. Otherwise he cannot attain his full stature. Civilization cannot advance on any other basis.

It is, of course, proper for the Government to extend aid to the needy in times of extraordinary stress and emergency. I should be the last to take any other position, for, whether it be creditable or otherwise, I was the first of all those connected with the Government to propose Federal relief for the suffering during the present emergency. Despite Mr. Hoover's recent claim on behalf of his party, it was I, a member of the opposition party, who originated the slogan that "no worthy American should be allowed to starve." I am, therefore, wholly committed to the policy of governmental recognition of responsibility for relief. This is based upon the dual principle of response to the instincts of humanity and of the right of the Government to preserve itself.

The fundamental trouble with the "share the wealth" advocates lies in their assumption that there is somewhere a vast and inexhaustible reservoir of wealth, and that all that is needed for perfect ease is that the individual should be able to connect with this fountain. They do not think things out and see that wealth does not consist of the mere counters of money and other bits of paper, but that real wealth consists in the product of mind and muscle, and can be created only through human effort. They do not see that wealth is constantly being destroyed through consumption and the processes of time. They do not see that if men should cease for only a year to labor in the creation of wealth, all civilization would perish and the few individuals who might survive would be forced into savagery. They do not see that it is only through increased production that the standard of living may be enhanced.

Whatever form the proposal for redistribution of wealth may take, it is un-American as a violation of man's right to enjoy the fruits of his own labors, a principle inherent in the preamble of the Declaration, which proclaims that "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" are among the inalienable rights of man.

The most amazing aspect of the situation is that the advocates of "redistribution" regard themselves as liberals. Since when did liberalism become the word for irresponsible experimentation and the reckless disregard of property rights? The only sense in which they are liberal is in the spending of other people's money. True liberalism stands for the greatest permissible freedom of action on the part of the citizen. It has no place in any system of regimentation or other form of collectivism.

The proposal is not even good socialism. Karl Marx preached the confiscation of wealth only as a necessary means to secure for the worker the full fruits of his labor. He never advocated that the lazy and incompetent should share equally with those of more usefulness to society. Even communism claims nothing for the man who will not work. No collectivist of any stripe, Socialist or what not, ever stood for such false equality.

All such measures are, of course, violative of the Constitution, but that is a matter of no moment to their advocates. They coolly invite us to change the organic law, so that those having any fruits of thrift and industry may be despoiled.

Schemes to share the wealth are, of course, immoral. They are merely a form of legalized robbery. They would take the savings of a man who has toiled and sacrificed to provide for his old age and give it to others who have no honest claim upon it.

But, to pass all other objections by, let us consider "sharing the wealth" solely from an economic standpoint; let us visualize the consequences of "redistribution." It would give each individual an undivided interest in mills, mines, railroads, and other property which have value only when used in cooperative effort. The inevitable consequence would be a wholesale slump in production, with disorder and starvation unparalleled even in Russia in 1920. It might even result in a total economic paralysis and chaos. This is the condition which the fanatics and demagogues invite us to submit to. It would be far better to have any intelligent system of collectivism, socialism, or even communism, than such an insane situation.

And bear in mind that there will be only one "redistribution." It will not occur the second time, for no wealth will be created for a second distribution. Robbed of the fruits of thrift and industry, man will no longer have the incentive to accumulate.

It is certain that times are getting better. The improvement as yet is slight, and in some lines it is not yet perceptible. However, on the whole, it is clear that an advance has been made. It is certain that it is merely a question of time before we will have normal conditions again. The question is one of time, which in turn depends largely upon the wisdom and fortitude with which we may deal with our problems. A lack of courage, patience, and straight thinking may operate to continue our sufferings for several years yet.

Recovery, when it does come, will come through the resumption of normal business activities. There is no other way. It cannot come through governmental spending nor through schemes of redistribution. It cannot come through reforms, however desirable they may be. It will come only when the wheels of industry begin to grind in the production of the things that men desire or that are required for their welfare.

Recovery will come through natural processes. How long it will be delayed will depend upon the extent of the interference with the free play of economic laws. Man did not enact these laws—he cannot repeal them. He may retard or thwart their operation only under the certain penalty of paying the price. In this situation may we demean ourselves in a manner worthy of our civilization and of citizenship in our great Republic.

REGENTS OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION

Pursuant to provisions of title 20, section 43, United States Code, the Speaker appointed as Regents of the Smithsonian Institution the following Members of the House: Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, of Maryland; Mr. CANNON, of Missouri; Mr. GIFFORD, of Massachusetts.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 388, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 388

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 9870, a bill to provide for the immediate payment of World War adjusted-service certificates, for the cancelation of unpaid interest accrued on loans secured by such certificates, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 4 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY].

Mr. Speaker, this is a rule for the consideration of the so-called "bonus" bill. In just a few words I shall explain the parliamentary situation. It has been the practice of the House to refer bills relating to the payment of the veterans' adjusted service certificates to the Committee on Ways and Means, which Committee also has charge of revenue-raising bills. This particular bill, however, and similar bills are not revenue-raising bills, and have no privileged status in the House. In the ordinary course of events, therefore, this bill could not come before the House without the aid of a special rule.

On the reporting of the bill by the Committee on Ways and Means, and I understand that report was practically unanimous, the Committee on Ways and Means appeared before the Rules Committee and asked the Rules Committee to bring in a rule for the consideration of the bill, that being the only method by which the bill could be considered on the floor of the House. The Ways and Means Committee requested 4 hours of general debate. If I recollect rightly, this subject has been discussed here once or twice before. The Rules Committee granted the request of the Committee on Ways and Means and brought in an open rule providing for 4 hours of general debate, after which the bill will be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

The question involved is one that is familiar to everyone here, and is also one in which millions of our people have shown an active personal interest. The matter has been before Congress during all of my service here and long before. It has been particularly a much-mooted question during the past 10 years. It is my desire and the desire of the Committee on Rules that it again be thoroughly considered by the House. We expect a vote will be taken on the final passage of the bill tomorrow afternoon so that the bill may be forwarded to the other body.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FENERTY].

Mr. FENERTY. Mr. Speaker, the time has now arrived when we, Members of this Congress, are privileged to write the luminous concluding chapter to a great and important phase of American history. It is now almost two decades since the Great War ended, leaving to many of our young men a heritage of interrupted careers and broken bodies. You remember the days when our boys returned from France, having succeeded in their mission to make the world, as President Wilson said, "a better place to live in." You recall the waving of banners, the sounds of music, the shouts of a happy populace, as the veterans of America's latest battles marched beneath the triumphal arches that a grateful Nation had builded in our city streets.

There were those among them in carriages and automobiles—young men who could no longer march as they did in the spring of 1917 on their way to unknown lands and unknowable fates. They, like all our veterans, had abandoned everything that life then held of success and happiness for the hardships of crowded camps, of rain-drenched battle cruisers, of mud-filled trenches, and fitful slumbers beneath the exploding shell fire of the lifted guns. They had not questioned the Nation's summons as they went forth with eager faces turned toward the rising sun.

What a contrast is today presented in the spectacle of our Nation's heroes standing in the bread lines, vainly seeking for employment, hoping against hope for some opportunity to earn the little necessary to keep their wives and children from want and cold during the rigors of the winter, waiting humbly, yet proudly, for America to remember darker days even than these, when they were chosen from among our citizenship to keep the dignity and integrity of our country untarnished.

TODAY

Look about you today, my colleagues—there are in the galleries of this Chamber, garbed in worn and insufficient clothing, men who once wore the uniform of their country; men whom you yourselves acclaimed as the saviors of the Nation; men of whom it was then said that no reward could adequately compensate them for their unselfish sacrifice. They wear no trim uniforms now. There is little light gleaming in their eyes, save that which is enkindled by their hope in us. No martial music now beats a rhythm for their feet. No cheers greet their approach. There they are—some of them, too, with sightless eyes, mutilated lungs, shattered nerves, weakened hearts. And beyond the walls of this Capitol, in the hospitals of the land, are thousands of men whom the Republic has forgotten, while within the little houses of the country are multitudes awaiting an opportunity for hospitalization—long lists numbering practically a fourth of those who answered the call to arms in 1917.

WE PAID A BONUS TO EUROPE

Almost 20 years have gone since the world's most tragic period came to a close. And after we returned from France the Government settled its debt in cash with everyone except the boys who had brought victory to the arms of America and the nations with which she was then associated. Railroads, manufacturers, clerks, shipyard workers—all received cash for their services and were promptly paid. Even Great Britain and France, those ungrateful nations which we had saved from inevitable and certain defeat, were given adjusted-service certificates by our Government in the form of cancelation of principal and interest to the extent of several billions of dollars of their debts to us, much of which money they actually used for payment of compensation to their own veterans at our expense. So, too, 600,000 Government employees who had remained at home received first a bonus of $120, then another of $240, and still a third of a similar amount, and finally in 1923 a Reclassification Act that materially increased the wages of all of them and even in some cases doubled and trebled their salaries. But the men who were willing, if need be, to die that the Government might live received no recognition until the passage of the Adjusted Service Certificate Act, and even then the amount was adjusted upon the basis of the lowest paid workingman. It is payment of this just debt that we urge upon you today.

PRESIDENT DENIES JUSTICE TO VETERANS

In May of last year, shortly after the President had read his veto message, shutting the door of promise in the faces of those who only a few years before had been hailed as the champions of liberty and democracy, I stood upon the floor of this House and used these words:

It is utterly ridiculous and fallacious for the President to insinuate that payment of this just debt would ultimately injure the financial credit of the Nation and impair recovery. He is himself a financial czar, having absolute dictatorial control of $5,000,000,000, not to mention the gigantic sums still left unspent from the last Congress. If he would be just to the veteran, let him take two billions from this huge fund and with it pay the soldiers the debt which the Nation owes them. He could pay every veteran the value of his adjusted-service certificate and still have enough left over to influence half a dozen national elections. Tomorrow I shall introduce a bill directing the President to do this, in the event that his veto be sustained.

FIRST BILL TO PAY BONUS FROM $4,000,000,000 FUND

I did introduce such a bill the following day, directing that the adjusted-service certificates be paid from the billions already in the President's control. I am in favor of any plan that will properly repay to the veterans this debt which has been overdue since the day they doffed their uniforms, and I believe that the manner of acquiring the funds is of less importance than the necessity and the justice of the payment. It is estimated by Commander Murphy, of the American Legion, Commander Van Zandt, of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and Commander Harlan, of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War, that $1,000,000,000 will be immediately required for the purpose. Since the country has already reached the limit of what is possible in the imposition of taxes, what more reasonable method of payment can be devised than to take the necessary money from the $2,000,000,000 that are now lying idle in the Treasury, part of the great fund which the administration demanded and received from this docile Congress. If the President is truly sincere in his oft-stated claim to assist the Nation in its struggle towards a return of prosperity, let him, in a spirit of atonement and patriotic service, take this money from its hiding place and put it into the hands of those whom the Washington Herald yesterday called "the Nation's patiently waiting creditors—the defenders of the Republic."

And while I shall gladly support any amendment which will hasten justice to the veterans by appropriating a portion of the huge $2,000,000,000 fund for the purpose, let it be understood that I will not vote tomorrow for any motion to recommit the bill for that reason, thus delaying the payment of the money which the veterans should have received many years ago.

WE CAN OVERRIDE THE VETO

We have been constantly informed that the President will veto any bill calling for the payment of the so-called "bonus" to the veterans of the World War. He told us in his veto message last year that it was his belief that the certificates were not due until 1945 and that payment before that time would violate the contract contained in them. It might be construed as partisan if I were even to allude to the fact that violation of contracts and repudiation of platform pledges have never before annoyed the conscience of this administration. But this debt, I repeat, became due 18 years ago, and besides, this is an election year—and in election years some of those who seek reelection are a trifle more susceptible to the wishes of those whom at other times they have systematically ignored. In any event, there are sufficient votes to pass the bonus over the President's veto and thus do tardy and long-delayed justice to the men who held aloft the torch that they caught flaming amid the poppies of Flanders Fields.

REMEDY A GREAT INJUSTICE

It is in our province today to remedy a great injustice. Let it no longer be said that less than 5 percent of the Nation's manpower should be required, in the name of patriotism, to undergo the rigors and torment of war for the general welfare and safety of the other 95 percent—for the mere privilege of being called veterans. Patriotism is a sublime virtue. Nations flourish and decay as the flame of patriotism burns brightly or flickers in its socket. But unselfish patriotism should not demand that one class alone should bear the burden of battle, the horrors and tortures of conflict, the sorrow and suffering of permanent disability.

LET US WRITE A NEW CHAPTER IN OUR HISTORY

Let us now, dispassionately and in utter sincerity, and in the name of the American people, blot out from our history the injustice that has so long and unreasonably delayed the hopes of those who, giving most, have received so little. The veteran waves no American flag in his demand for his rights. He makes no flamboyant claim to being a better American or a more loyal patriot than others. He scorns to solicit from your charity that which his patriotic devotion gives him the right to challenge from your sense of justice. Before the setting of tomorrow's sun let it be said that America has refused to take her hand from salute to her brave defenders to put a penny in her pocket. Let the determination of the Members of this House be written indelibly into the pages of our national archives. Let it be remembered that—

Truth must triumph at the last, as round and round we run,
For ever the right comes uppermost, and ever is justice done.

In this spirit, Mr. Speaker and my colleagues of the House, I urge you to vote for the immediate payment of the World War adjusted-service certificates. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

SO-CALLED "BONUS" BILL

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include certain excerpts in connection with the statement I shall make.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, we are considering now a rule which calls for the consideration of the bill to pay in full in cash now the remainder due to three and a half million veterans of the World War on their adjusted-service certificates. This rule, of course, will be debated 1 hour, and the bill will be called up for consideration if the rule is adopted, and, of course, I assume that it will be adopted.

RULES COMMITTEE CONGRATULATED

First, I congratulate the Rules Committee. This committee has been, as always, unusually fair. It seems to me that they have gone out of their way to give consideration to the views and suggestions of everyone in connection with this legislation. Last year a rule was brought out by the Rules Committee that made it possible for any plan of payment to be considered. It was made broad. It was made liberal in order that all views, suggestions, and proposals of Members might be considered. This year the Rules Committee has cooperated in every way to make sure that everyone will receive a fair and square deal. I want to congratulate the members of that committee on their fairness and the interest they have manifested in this legislation.

CONGRESSMAN O'CONNOR COMMENDED

Especially do I commend the chairman of that committee, the Honorable JOHN J. O'CONNOR. He has been fair in every way, and I personally am under many obligations to him for the very fair and excellent way in which he has handled the rule for this legislation. We have had many conferences with him on this matter, and he has always been very patient and considerate.

VINSON-PATMAN-M'CORMACK BILL

The bill that comes up this morning after the adoption of this rule will be the bill known as the Vinson-Patman-McCormack bill. I am very glad indeed to be associated with my good friends Congressmen VINSON and MCCORMACK in sponsoring this legislation. We have been fighting together for this legislation for years, and I am glad we are together working shoulder to shoulder in an effort to have this legislation passed. My name on the authorship of the bill does not mean that I am one of the authors, necessarily.

It means all of those who have worked with me for so many years. They are just as much joint authors of this bill as I am, as far as I am personally concerned. We are all working together.

METHOD OF PAYMENT NOT INVOLVED

This particular bill does not provide a method of payment. It is an authorization. If this bill becomes law as it is now, the question will then be as to the method of payment to the veterans. We are not going to raise that question on this bill. It will not be in order. It is not germane. We understand that. We go into it with our eyes open. We are working with the three major veteran organizations, the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and the Disabled American Veterans of the World War, and I commend their national commanders, my friends Murphy, Van Zandt, and Harlan, for getting together and working shoulder to shoulder, trying to get this bill passed for the veterans. We are not going to try to get a method of payment on this bill. We are going to work with them and they with us. After this bill is enacted into law, then the question of the payment will come up and I, for one, expect to propose that it be paid as I have advocated, along with others on this floor for many years. These veterans' organizations are not going to oppose us. They are not going to throw any stones in our way. They are not going to do anything that would prevent our method of payment being adopted.

AUTHORIZATION NOT APPROPRIATION

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. This bill authorizes an appropriation to pay the certificates. In the last Congress we passed a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds up to quite an unlimited amount.

Mr. PATMAN. The Second Liberty Loan Act was amended to permit that; yes.

Mr. MAPES. If this legislation is passed and no other legislation is passed, such as the gentleman has in mind advocating, the only alternative will be for the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds in order to get the money to pay these certificates. Is that not true?

Mr. PATMAN. I am glad the gentleman asked that question. If this bill passes as it is, the Secretary of the Treasury cannot, under the amendment to the Second Liberty Loan Act or any other law, issue bonds. It will next be necessary for an appropriation bill to be passed. If an appropriation bill is passed without any specific method, then, under the law which the gentleman mentions, the Secretary of the Treasury may issue bonds and get the money to make these payments.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield further?

ISSUE WILL BE TAXES OR NEW MONEY

Mr. PATMAN. In just a moment. I presume that in the appropriation of such a large sum of money, the issue will be before this Congress, and not very long from this time, as to whether or not we will levy more taxes to pay this debt or whether we will use the idle, unused gold in the Treasury to pay the debt. Then the Members of Congress can vote as they choose. I expect to vote to issue the money on the gold, and no new taxes will be required.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield further right there?

Mr. PATMAN. I only have a few minutes. I hope the gentleman will not take too much of my time.

Mr. MAPES. I agree with the gentleman's statement, but if the bill passes authorizing the appropriation, then an appropriation follows, more or less as a matter of course?

Mr. PATMAN. In an ordinary bill that is true; but in one involving such a large sum of money, I do not think that rule would prevail.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Is it correct, according to the gentleman's statement, as I understand it, that it will be necessary to either vote additional taxes or authorize the payment based on idle gold in the Treasury, by issuing currency, before this bill can be complied with?

Mr. PATMAN. Before the veterans will get their money, yes; but we know this House is not going to adjourn until provisions are made for the money to be paid after the authorization is passed.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

REFUND OF INTEREST

Mr. COX. Of course, I am not opposing the adoption of the rule, but are you not inviting trouble in the future by reason of the preference that you are showing the borrowers on certificates in giving them accrued interest? On what basis do you justify that preferential treatment of the borrower?

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman has asked me a question that would take several minutes to answer. I only have 2 minutes remaining and I hope the gentleman will excuse me, and I will extend my remarks and answer that very question which the gentleman has propounded.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman speaks on the bill, I hope he will answer that question.

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

CHAIRMAN DOUGHTON AND WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE

I want to commend the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, Mr. DOUGHTON. He has worked long and hard on a bill to provide for the payment of this obligation, not only this year but other years. Members of the committee have worked with him, and they are just as much entitled to credit in regard to this legislation as any other Member of the House; myself or anybody else. They have tried to give everybody a fair and square deal in every way.

I therefore want to commend the members of the Ways and Means Committee and especially the chairman of that committee.

I hope this rule is adopted. [Applause.]

ADJUSTED COMPENSATION ACT OF 1924

In May 1924 Congress enacted a law over a Presidential veto providing for the issuance of adjusted-service certificates to veterans of the World War. By reason of the passage of this law three and a half million veterans now hold adjusted-service certificates of the average value of $1,000. Most of these certificates were issued January 1, 1925.

FIRST BILL FOR FULL PAYMENT

May 28, 1929, I introduced a bill in the House of Representatives, and Senator Smith W. Brookhart, of Iowa, introduced a bill in the Senate of the United States providing for the full and immediate cash payment of these certificates. During the latter part of 1929, when the stock market broke and the depression set in, and during the year 1930, many of us were selling the country on the theory that the payment of the remainder due the soldiers would revive buying power and start the country on the way back to recovery. I still believe the results would have been satisfying.

THE 50-PERCENT LOAN LAW

In 1931 our strength had grown sufficiently that our opponents, in order to prevent a forcing of the issue on full and immediate cash payment, caused to be enacted a bill which we supported, providing for a 50-percent loan to the holders of these certificates. These loans were to be made at an interest rate of 4½ percent. During the year 1932 another law was passed which reduced the interest rate to 3½ percent.

PAY IN NEW MONEY

From 1931 to the present time many of us have been advocating a bill for the payment of these certificates that would cause the payment to be made with non-interest-bearing Treasury notes, oftentimes referred to as greenbacks or paper money, but, incidentally, the same kind of money as much of the money that is now outstanding, and would be on a par with all other money issued by the Government.

INCREASED STRENGTH EACH SESSION

Our bill first passed the House of Representatives June 15, 1932, by a vote of 211 for to 176 against. It was killed in the Senate June 17, 1932, by a vote of 62 against to 18 for. Our bill again passed the House March 12, 1934, by a vote of 295 for to 125 against. It was again killed in the Senate June 11, 1934, by a vote of 51 against to 31 for. Our bill again passed the House of Representatives March 22, 1935, by a vote of 318 for to 90 against. It passed the Senate May 7, 1935, by a vote of 55 for to 33 against, lacking 9 votes of receiving a two-thirds majority in that body. The President vetoed the bill, and his veto was overridden by the House May 22, 1935, by a vote of 322 for to 98 against. The President's veto was sustained by the Senate May 23, 1935, by a vote of 54 to override to 40 against overriding; a two-thirds vote being necessary to override a veto. Of the 514 Representatives of the two Houses of Congress who voted, 376 voted for our bill in 1935 and only 138 against it; in other words, over 73 percent of those voting voted for the bill.

FORCED CONSIDERATION JANUARY 13

Before the end of the first session of this Congress in 1935 those of us who have fought for this legislation for many years succeeded in obtaining the signatures of 218 Members of the House of Representatives to a motion to discharge the Committee on Ways and Means from further consideration of our bill, H. R. 1, in order that we may force consideration of the bill at the beginning of this session of Congress. The petition which would force consideration of our bill next Monday, January 13, was signed by the following Members of the House:

LIST OF MEMBERS WHO SIGNED PETITION TO DISCHARGE WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE FROM THE CONSIDERATION OF THE BILL H. R. 1

Alabama: Starnes and Boykin.
Arizona: Greenway.
Arkansas: McClellan, Miller, Cravens, and Driver.
California: Stubbs, Scott, Colden, Costello, Kramer, Hoeppel, McGroarty, Dockweiler, Gearhart, Tolan, McGrath, and Welch.
Colorado: Cummings and Martin.
Connecticut: Citron, Shanley, and Kopplemann.
Florida: Green.
Georgia: Deen, Brown, Owen, Vinson, and Whelchel.
Idaho: White.
Illinois: Schuetz, Adair, Reed, Dirksen, Arends, Allen, Mitchell, O'Brien, McAndrews, Schaefer, Thompson, Kelly, Beam, McKeough, Sabath, Mason, Dobbins, Brennan, Meeks, Parsons, Keller, and Buckbee.
Indiana: Schulte, Griswold, Jenckes, Greenwood, Crowe, Gray, Larrabee, and Ludlow.
Iowa: Eicher, Jacobsen, Wearin, and Gilchrist.
Kansas: Lambertson, Guyer, Patterson, Carpenter, Houston, Carlson, and Hope.
Kentucky: May and Robsion.
Louisiana: Fernandez, Maloney, Sandlin, Wilson, Sanders, DeRouen, and Dear.
Maryland: Goldsborough, Palmisano, and Kennedy.
Massachusetts: Granfield, Connery, Healey, Higgins, and McCormack.
Michigan: Sadowski, Blackney, Wolcott, Crawford, Engel, Hook, Rabaut, Dingell, Lesinski, and Dondero.
Minnesota: Ryan, Lundeen, Knutson, Kvale, Pittenger, and Buckler.
Mississippi: Rankin, Doxey, Ford, Dunn, Colmer, and McGehee.
Missouri: Nelson, Wood, and Cannon.
Montana: Monaghan and Ayers.
Nebraska: Luckey, Stefan, Binderup, and Coffee.
Nevada: Scrugham.
New Jersey: Wolverton and Kenney.
New Mexico: Dempsey.
New York: Brunner, Delaney, Sirovich, Kennedy, Marcantonio, and Dickstein.
North Carolina: Hancock and Weaver.
North Dakota: Burdick and Lemke.
Ohio: Kniffin, Polk, Fletcher, Duffey, Underwood, Secrest, Ashbrook, Imhoff, Sweeney, and Crosser.
Oklahoma: Disney, Nichols, Cartwright, Gassaway, Lee, Johnson, Massingale, Ferguson, and Rogers.
Oregon: Mott and Pierce.
Pennsylvania: Dorsey, Stack, Frey, Gildea, Focht, Doutrich, Walter, Haines, Gingery, Faddis, Eckert, Gray, Berlin, Crosby, Moritz, Ellenbogen, and Dunn.
Rhode Island: O'Connell.
South Carolina: Fulmer, Taylor, and Richards.
South Dakota: Hildebrandt and Werner.
Tennessee: Reece, Taylor, Mitchell, and Turner.
Texas: Patman, Dies, Sanders, Johnson, Patton, Eagle, Mansfield, Cross, McFarlane, Thomason, Blanton, Mahon, Maverick, and South.
Utah: Murdock and Robinson.
Virginia: Flannagan.
Washington: Zioncheck, Wallgren, Smith, Knute Hill, and Lloyd.
West Virginia: Ramsay, Randolph, Edmiston, and Johnson.
Wisconsin: Amlie, Sauthoff, Withrow, Cannon, O'Malley, Boileau, Schneider, Hull, and Gehrmann.

Although the petition was not considered a reflection on the Ways and Means Committee, most of whom are our supporters, the motion was perfected for the purpose of protecting our rights at the beginning of this session and to force early consideration of the legislation. No one will dispute the fact that this petition, which forced consideration of the bill next Monday, January 13, 1936, has caused early action on this legislation. This bill would not be before Congress now so soon after Congress met on January 3 were it not for this petition, which will force consideration next Monday. Therefore, the signers of this petition are entitled to much credit for getting immediate consideration of our proposal.

STEERING COMMITTEE

For several years I have been assisted by a steering committee for the passage of H. R. 1, known as the Patman bill.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY HOUSE MEMBERS JOINT AUTHORS

It is a matter of small concern to me or to the veterans whether I am the author of the particular bill that pays the debt. It is not pride of authorship that we are interested in. At least 150 Members of the House of Representatives are just as much entitled to be known as joint authors of the Patman bill as myself. For many years we have all worked together on this proposal. For several years in the House I have been aided and assisted by a steering committee. This committee is composed of the following Members: ABE MURDOCK, of Utah, secretary; ADOLPH J. SABATH, Illinois; JAMES G. SCRUGHAM, Nevada; ARTHUR H. GREENWOOD, Indiana; WILLIAM M. COLMER, Mississippi; JENNINGS RANDOLPH, West Virginia; CLARENCE CANNON, Missouri; WILLIAM P. CONNERY, Jr., Massachusetts; WILLIAM M. BERLIN, Pennsylvania; FRANK HANCOCK, North Carolina; JED JOHNSON, Oklahoma; JAMES P. RICHARDS, South Carolina; GERALD J. BOILEAU, Wisconsin; ANDREW J. MAY, Kentucky; FRED H. HILDEBRANDT, South Dakota; MARTIN F. SMITH, Washington; MARTIN DIES, Texas; JOHN E. MILLER, Arkansas; GEORGE A. DONDERO, Michigan; PAUL J. KVALE, Minnesota; ROY E. AYERS, Montana; and myself, chairman.

I am personally greatly indebted to the members of this committee for their very able, loyal, and effective support in this cause. Without this good steering committee, success would not have been possible.

"BONUS" A MISNOMER

The word "bonus" is a misnomer, was coined by the enemies of the veterans, and should never be used. Adjusted-service certificates were delivered to veterans in return for services rendered at a very low rate of pay.

SOLDIERS' PAY VERSUS CIVILIAN PAY

April 6, 1917, war was declared by this country against Germany. Congress immediately commenced consideration of a bill that had for its purpose raising an army. Little consideration was given to the question of pay that men in uniform would receive. It was well known that if any injustice should be done in this regard it could be corrected later. Between four and five million men were caused to don the uniform of their country. Practically all of these men felt it was their duty, desired to be patriotic, and, like all good soldiers, served wherever they were called upon to serve. Nevertheless, it was admitted that practically all of them suffered a serious economic disability by being required to serve at $1 a day, when others, for various reasons exempted from military service, were making, in the words of our own great President, from $8 to $20 a day in the shipyards and munition factories.

DEDUCTIONS GOT THE $30 A MONTH

Do not get the impression that the private soldier actually received $30 a month, as reported. The average allotment of his pay for his dependents, if he had dependents, was about $15 a month. He was required to carry war-risk insurance, which cost him on an average of $6.60 a month, the Government thereby requiring him to make his monthly contribution for the protection of the loved ones of his dead buddies. Four million veterans paid Uncle Sam approximately $400,000,000 in this way for which they did not receive one penny in return.

Uncle Sam paid for the insurance on his ships, but not on his men. The soldier was required to pay for altering and mending his clothing and shoes, his barber bills, laundry bills, and bills at canteens for tobacco and incidentals. If he had anything left, he subscribed for a Liberty bond on the installment plan or he was called a "slacker."

Commissioner O'Reilly, who is now an alderman in a western city, at the end of his first month in the service, after waiting 2 hours in line with his company, approached the paymaster's table, saluted, and gave his name, he told Mr. James E. Van Zandt, commander in chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars. The paymaster, looking at the company pay roll, replied, "Private O'Reilly, you owe this Government 80 cents."

OTHERS RECEIVED ADJUSTED PAY

When the war was over those who dealt with property rights had their pay adjusted by the Congress of the United States. Seven thousand World War "cost plus" contractors—many of them had engaged in a "war for profits"—had their pay adjusted. Included in this group were the Du Ponts, who recently admitted that they made a profit of a quarter of a billion dollars out of the war after paying all expenses and taxes on what they billed to South American countries as "sporting goods." The railroad owners and war contractors received an adjustment of pay in cash and other benefits amounting to billions of dollars. They asked the Government for a revision of their contracts and were not called unpatriotic for doing it, and they were paid in cash.

Five hundred thousand Federal employees of the Government, who received up to $2,500 a year during the war, received an adjustment of pay amounting to $1,440 each—they asked for a revision of their contracts and they were paid in cash $240 a year for 6 years.

Foreign countries asked for a revision of their contracts and had their debts adjusted, which resulted in Congress giving to them as an outright gift the huge sum of $10,000,000,000. Many of these countries used our money to pay their own soldiers adjusted pay and bonuses up to the enormous sum of $7,290 each.

CONSCIENCE-STRICKEN CONGRESS

After doing so much for property rights and foreign countries, a conscience-stricken Congress was determined to make some adjustment of pay received by the men who wore the uniform. The cost of the war was $36,000,000,000; the men in uniform received $4,500,000,000. It was agreed that the Members of Congress could not save their faces and allow less than $1 a day as adjusted pay.

SECRET CAUCUS AND CHISELING AMENDMENTS

The Ways and Means Committee of the House consisted of 15 Republicans and 10 Democrats. The Republicans put the Democrats out of the committee room, closed the door, called in representatives from the War Department, and outlined the plan of paying $1 a day to each veteran for home service and $1.25 a day for service overseas. These representatives were instructed to suggest how deductions and reductions could be made, to propose every chiseling amendment for which any argument could be offered for its adoption, and to get up some sort of a plan that would appear to the veterans that they were actually getting the $1 a day, but which, in fact, would be so manipulated that they would get just as little of it as possible. One of the unfairest chiseling amendments was the deduction of the first $60. Another was to provide a way whereby the banks would consume one-half of each certificate through compound interest after a few loans, obtained in dribs, had been made.

In this secret caucus, where words were spoken that were supposed to never be known, the plan was conceived which was enacted to give the veteran a post-dated check, an I O U, or a "tombstone" certificate, payable in 1945. The basis for it was the $1 a day for domestic service and $1.25 for service overseas, plus interest at 4 percent and plus 25 percent of the basic pay for waiting from 1925 until 1945. The veterans were not asked to take or reject these certificates. They had to take them or leave them alone, just like they were compelled to go in the service, whether they wanted to or not.

CERTIFICATE HOLDERS AND REMAINDER DUE

Three and one-half million veterans hold certificates, averaging $1,000; three million of them have borrowed the limit allowed by law, which is 50 percent of each certificate, and after deducting prior loans and interest before October 6, 1931, there is a remainder due of $2,000,000,000. They are paying $163,000 a day in compound interest on these loans to the Government and to the banks, which is rapidly consuming the balance due.

HIGH INTEREST AND TIME DUE

They have paid as high as 6-percent and 8-percent interest, compounded annually, for their own money. If the Government should now allow the veterans the highest interest rate the veterans were charged, an amount equal to the face value of each certificate was due long before 1931. If the certificates remain as they are, the average veteran who has a $1,000 certificate will receive the small sum of $68.50 in 1945. Compound interest paid to the banks and to the Government on a few small loans obtained in dribs will have eaten up the remainder.

If Congress grants a revision of the contract, as requested in H. R. 1, and these certificates are dated back to the time the services were rendered, and there is an adjustment of interest so as to give the veteran the same rate of interest, and no more, that was paid to war contractors, railroad owners, and all others on contracts growing out of the World War, and is given only the earned part of the 25-percent increase that Congress admitted was due for waiting 20 years and not deduct the first $60, each veteran is entitled at this time to a substantial sum more than the face value of his certificate. If the Government will allow the veteran the earned part of the 25 percent for waiting, along with the $1 and $1.25 a day, together with a rate of interest less than the Government has charged veterans, 6 percent compounded annually, an amount equal to the full face value of each certificate was due October 1, 1931.

PAST DUE ANY WAY IT IS COMPUTED

There is no fair way to compute the amount due a veteran, using the $1 and $1.25 a day as a basis, without determining that each veteran was entitled to an amount equal to the full face value of his certificate on or before October 1, 1931.

If the veterans receive credit for a fair adjustment of interest, and the certificates are dated back to 1918, they have borrowed the equivalent of the accumulated interest—the principal remains intact.

We are not trying to change the amount of $1 a day for home service and $1.25 a day for service overseas, representing the basic pay of $1,400,000,000, that Congress acknowledged. We want it paid as of the time the services were rendered.

According to the testimony of Secretary of War Baker before the House Appropriations Committee in 1918, it cost the Government $154 a year for each soldier for food, clothing, and maintenance. This was less than 50 cents a day. The first financial benefit the veteran received was the $1 a day, a greater part of which was taken up by deductions for allotments, insurance, and so forth. The next financial benefit was food and clothing, which cost the Government less than 50 cents a day, and the third financial benefit is the extra compensation confessed by Congress in 1924, and which is included in the adjusted-service certificates.

VETERANS FIGURED OUT OF 7 YEARS' INTEREST

Mr. Andrew Mellon, with his short pencil in the middle of the night, aided by a secret committee meeting, figured the veterans out of 7 years' interest. This omission appears to have been deliberate, since title 5, section 501, of the act provides that in no case shall a veteran receive interest before January 1, 1925. He also persuaded the committee to deduct the first $60 and then got the bill passed through the House under a gag rule that did not permit an amendment to cross a "t" and dot an "i."

January 28, 1931, the Committee on Finance of the United States Senate was considering my bill to pay this debt in full. Mr. Andrew Mellon testified. Under Secretary Mills was by his side and was answering many of the questions. Senator CONNALLY, of Texas, asked him this question:

If you are going to base compensation on the idea of interest, why should you ignore the 7 years that had expired between the war and the date you were settling with them?

Under Secretary Mills answered for Mr. Mellon:

We did. That is the answer.

Senator CONNALLY:

But why should you ignore it?

The answer was:

I do not know; but we did ignore it.

Mr. Mellon and Mr. Mills were not in the habit of making admissions favorable to veterans. This testimony may be found on page 62 of the hearings.

BABY BONDS

The United States Treasury is now selling baby bonds. The face amount of the bond is due in 1945 if purchased in 1935. Suppose the holder of one of those baby bonds should in 1945 discover that 7 years' interest had been omitted in computing his bond, and according to its terms he would not receive the full amount until 7 years later, or 1952. In such a case he would be entitled to ask for a revision of the terms of his bond in order that he may not be deprived of the 7 years' interest. This is exactly what the veterans are doing today. In calculating the amount due these veterans, 7 years' interest was ignored.

COMPARED WITH LIFE-INSURANCE POLICY

Comparing a certificate with a life-insurance policy is not fair. A life-insurance policy is a voluntary contract, and the one obtaining it accepts the contract and complies with its terms and provisions. These so-called "bonus" certificates are not contracts, and the veteran did not accept its terms. He had no option. He had to accept it or receive nothing.

CRIES OF DEFICITS AND TAX REDUCTIONS

The acknowledgment of this debt was delayed several years by cries of deficits and tax reductions, which were not heard when billions were being voted for adjusted pay to others.

The Secretary of the Treasury, when the bill was before Congress, predicted a great deficit at the end of the next fiscal year. He made a billion-dollar error in his prediction, but the discovery, months later, was too late—as intended—for the "tombstone" certificate bill had already become a law.

REFUNDS OF INCOME-TAX PAYMENTS

Income-tax payers received approximately $3,000,000,000 in adjustments on their income-tax payments made during and by reason of the war. Secretary Andrew Mellon made huge refunds to citizen Andrew Mellon and to citizen Andrew Mellon companies. When a payment was made on such a refund, 6-percent interest was allowed by him from 1918, or the time of the alleged overpayment. He did not forget his own interest over the same period of time he deprived the veteran of interest on a confessed debt.

Suppose holders of Government bonds should discover they paid money for bonds in 1918 and that they were not drawing interest until 1925. One of such bondholders would make more noise than a thousand veterans are now making over a similar loss.

VETERAN RECEIVED $1; MUST PAY HIS PART OF $21

Veteran A entered the service during the war and received $1 a day. Civilian B went to the shipyards and received $20 a day. The Government borrowed $21 a day to pay the pair. When the war was over, these debts had to be paid. Veteran A, although he received only one of the $21, must pay his part of the entire $21. With the adjusted pay, the veteran receives about 20 percent or less of what civilians received. If a veteran should receive more than a civilian, the excess could properly be termed a bonus, or pay for patriotism, but such is not the case.

A few companies made as much in net profits during the war as we are asking now to be paid on a confessed debt to three and one-half million men.

PAYMENT WILL KILL UNREASONABLE DEMANDS

If the payment is made now and veterans should make an unreasonable demand, public sentiment will be against it. But if you let a few banks of the country and the Government unfairly deprive the veterans of half of their certificates, public sentiment will likely be with them for anything they want—reasonable or unreasonable.

VINSON-PATMAN-M'CORMACK BILL

Our group is supporting the bill known as the Vinson-Patman-McCormack bill, H. R. 9870, for full and immediate cash payment. It carries authorization for an appropriation for the payment. When this bill becomes a law, it will then be material to propose a method of payment. Our group will insist upon the method as embodied in H. R. 1. After the Vinson-Patman-McCormack bill becomes law, the veterans' organizations will not oppose us in our efforts to get the payment made according to the way we want it made. We have agreed not to insist upon the method of payment in this authorization bill, and they will not resist our efforts to get our method adopted for the payment after this authorization bill is enacted into law. Our steering committee has at all times maintained that our first objective is full and immediate cash payment. We are, however, secondarily interested in the method of payment—one that will help the country as well as the veterans. We are submerging the method of payment embodied in H. R. 1 at this time until the authorization bill becomes a law in compliance with that policy.

HOUSE BILL 1 FOR IMMEDIATE PAYMENT

Our bill, H. R. 1, provides that each veteran who holds a certificate will get the remainder due him in cash immediately. Prior loans received on his certificate will be deducted, but no interest to be deducted on loans after October 1, 1931.

Government currency will be issued to pay the debt, and, as this form of Government currency is paid to the veterans, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, if he desires, to retire from circulation another form of Government currency—Federal Reserve notes—equal to the amount paid the veterans. This provision removes any chance of inflation, because as one form of money is paid to the veterans another form of money is retired. Therefore, the circulating medium will not necessarily be increased by one dollar. Anyone who charges that the bill is inflationary is either misinformed, uninformed, or is deliberately misrepresenting the facts. A bond bill that the bankers want will be inflationary.

MAY BE PAID IN GOLD

The daily statement of the United States Treasury today discloses that the Government has on hand more than $10,000,000,000 in pure gold and more than $1,000,000,000 in silver. According to existing law, the title to all gold is in the Government of the United States. Therefore, the Government possesses enough gold to set aside a 100-percent reserve to take care of all outstanding money and to then set aside $2,000,000,000 to pay the remainder due the veterans 100 cents on the dollar in gold, and still have more than $3,000,000,000 in idle gold and $1,000,000,000 in idle silver. In view of these undisputed facts, how can one contend that it would not be idiotic and imbecilic for the Government to issue more tax-exempt, interest-bearing bonds to pay the debt owed to the soldiers? If the debt is not paid in the manner we propose, it will take more bonds and more taxes to pay it. Practically all the $4,800,000,000 appropriated for public works has been allocated; only a very small sum remains in this fund. Therefore, the debt cannot be paid from this fund. A question remains: Will we pay the debt in Government currency, based upon a 100-percent gold reserve, or will we issue more nontaxable, interest-bearing bonds to pay it? Our plan is a sensible, sane, and reasonable plan. It will require neither bonds nor taxes to make the payment. If there is objection to printing the money based upon the gold, as Congressman RANKIN, of Mississippi, has pointed out, the payment can conveniently and safely be made in pure gold.

BANKERS GREATLY BENEFITED

No group in America has been helped more since March 4, 1933, than the big banking group, yet they demonstrated monumental gall and gross ingratitude at the recent New Orleans convention of the American Bankers' Association and are now trying to chisel in on the payment of this debt. Let me tell you the benefits the banking group has received during this period:

(1) All the banks were closed on March 4, 1933. They owed the people $40,000,000,000 and had in their vaults only $1.75 for every $100 owed. Congress passed a law allowing the bankers to put up any sort of paper, collateral or no collateral, even their own demand notes, and get money printed on them in order that their doors might be opened. The credit of the Nation was being used absolutely free by the bankers, and they paid only 27 cents per thousand dollars for printing the money.

(2) All deposits of $5,000 or less have been guaranteed by an agency of the Government, the Government paying $300,000,000 of what can be termed the initial premium and the banks only $39,000,000 of the premium.

(3) The Government purchased half the stock in practically all the banks. This stock is tax-exempt. This has enabled the banks to get a 50-percent tax reduction during the depression, which no other group received.

(4) A law was passed relieving the banks of the obligation to pay interest on demand deposits, thereby saving them more than $250,000,000 a year.

(5) The Government has delivered to them Government bonds, tax-exempt, interest-bearing, for a bank's credit, which enables them to collect three-fourths of a billion dollars a year in interest from the Government, representing a pure bonus, subsidy, or gratuity.

BANKERS' DOLE

Therefore, the banks of the Nation during this depression have received a 50-percent tax reduction, a saving of $250,000,000 a year interest on demand deposits, collecting $750,000,000 a year interest on Government bonds that they are holding, enjoying a guaranty of their deposits practically at Government expense, and using the credit of the Nation absolutely free. The bankers have been and are now enjoying a Government dole equal to more than millions of poor and unfortunate people receive annually.

Considering all these benefits, the banking group has been well taken care of, and I see no reason why Congress should give them an additional "rake-off" or "grab" of $2,000,000,000 in order to pay a just and honest debt of $2,000,000,000 to the veterans of the World War.

WEALTHY ESCAPE TAXATION

There are outstanding today tax-exempt obligations issued by the Federal, State, county, and city governments amounting to more than $50,000,000,000. The people who hold these obligations do not pay taxes on them. We are rapidly going in the direction of permitting the people who own the wealth of this Nation to go scot free of any sort of tax and compelling others to pay taxes on what they owe and what they consume, in order to support our different governments. The issuance of nontaxable, interest-bearing bonds must be stopped. The time is opportune—it is now! The big bankers will object. They want their "drag" or "rake-off" on every debt, or they will oppose the payment of the debt. Now is the time to start in the direction of the Government's issuing its own credit within limited bounds and reasonable limitations, according to the Constitution of the United States, instead of the Government's paying the bankers for the use of the Government's credit.

No longer should we permit the credit of this Nation to be farmed out for the use and abuse of a few big bankers.

PAYMENT NOW WILL HELP ENTIRE COUNTRY

In conclusion, may I repeat that the debt to the veterans is past due because 7 years' interest was ignored in computing the so-called "bonus" certificates; that the full amount should be paid now without deducting interest on loans since 1931. This will require the payment of $2,000,000,000 to the veterans, which will go into every nook and corner of the Nation. It will be new and added purchasing power that will quickly flow into the channels of trade and production and not only help the veterans but help everybody. The payment can safely be made without bonds or taxes. It can even be made in pure gold, and the Treasury will still have sufficient gold to redeem all outstanding money and have on hand $4,000,000,000 in idle gold and silver.

If this bill is enacted into law, the veterans in the following-named States will receive the amounts indicated:

The figures in parentheses represent the number of veterans holding certificates, and the other figures represent the total amount that will be paid to them after deducting all prior loans and interest before October 1, 1931.

This computation and the following computations are based upon no interest being paid by the veteran on prior loans after October 1, 1931. The Vinson-Patman-McCormack bill provides for a cancelation of all interest on loans after the year 1931. This will change the figures very, very slightly, not more than a few dollars in each county.

After deducting all prior loans, with interest to October 1, 1931, there is estimated to be a remainder due to the veterans the sum of $2,015,162,456.76, which includes the amount due the ones who have not negotiated loans on their certificates; interest on loans prior to October 1, 1931, amounts to a comparatively small sum.

If the face or maturity value of these certificates is paid in full at this time, there will be a remainder due the veterans in each county in the United States approximately as follows (this information compiled from information obtained from the Veterans' Administration, Statistical Division of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, and from other governmental sources):
